What was the Difference?

HE: "You haven't a mind above a new hat." She: "And you haven't any mind under yours."

What an Insult.

"I SUPPOSE you've never been kissed by a man before?" he said. "Do I look as plain as all that?" she demanded haughtily.

Fond of Arms.

CLARA: "I see Cynthia had decorated her room with guns, pistols, swords, and the like." Cora: "Yes, she always has been a great girl for having arms about her."

No Cloak Needed Then.

SHE: "There are people who use religion as a cloak." He: "I know it." "What will they do in the next world, do you think?" "Oh, they won't need any cloak there."

She Knew Something.

"I HAVE one request to make," said the pretty typine, when she had accepted her employer's proposal of marriage. "Name it, my love." "Let me select my successor at the desk."

Very Temperate Man.

GRIMSBY: "So you want to marry my daughter, sir! What are your principles? Are you temperate?" Fledgely: "Temperate! Why, I am so strict that it gives me pain even to find my boots tight."

Both Had Changed.

SHE: "It is ten years to-day since we were married. I notice a great change in you. You don't kiss me any more. You are not like what you used to be." He: "Well, you see, that comes from you, too, not being like what you used to be."

Spelt His Name Wrong.

SHE: "What makes you look so sad?" He: "I had hoped to be able to make my name go echoing through the halls of Time." She: "Yes?" He: "Well, after many efforts I've just succeeded in getting it into the papers, but, confound them, they've spelt it wrong!"

Mental, not Sentimental.

"I HAVE to help Johnny with his mental arithmetic every evening," said the young woman, "and it is a nuisance." "Do you—er—find that celebrated problem about one plus one equals one?" asked the young man. "I said mental arithmetic, not sentimental," said the young woman, with great dignity.

Not the Only Lunatic.

"DID you read this, dear?" said Mrs. Grigsby to Orlando the other night. "It's a strange case. A harmless lunatic imagines that he's a grain of corn, and will not go into the yard lest a chicken eat him. Isn't it an odd delusion?" "Oh, the world's full of such delusions, dear," said Grigsby. "I know a harmless lunatic who seems to imagine that she's a piece of cheese, and she will fly from a room when a mouse enters it for fear the little creature will devour her."

A Real Bargain Sale.

HE: "I only pay a shilling an hour for this boat." She: "That's why I like it. It's a regular bargain sail."

What Had Dropped.

MAMMA: "Alice, what happenedlas t evening? I thought I heard something drop in the drawing-room." Alice: "I think Mr. Templeton fell in love with me."

She Could Measure His Pocket.

HER RIVAL: "Of course you can't measure his heart by the size of the diamond in your engagement ring." She of the ring: "No, but I can measure his pocket by it."

Such a Thoughtful Girl.

CLARA: "She is an awfully thoughtful girl." Tom: "Indeed?" Clara: "Yes; she has trimmed her new theatre hat with a pair of opera-glasses for the use of the gentleman who sits behind her."

They Parted as Friends.

"WHAT a hold Maud seems to have on all her rejected suitors." "Why shouldn't she, the artful thing? She always tells a man, when she refuses him, that she is afraid to marry a handsome man because she would be so jealous."

He Liked the Musician.

"ARE you fond of music?" asked a stranger of the young man at the concert, who was applauding vigorously after a pretty girl had sung in a very painful way. "Not particularly," said the young man frankly, "but I'm exceedingly fond of the musician."

The One Who Guessed Lowest.

"YOU see, it was this way. They were all three so much in love with her and all so eligible, that to settle the matter she agreed to marry the one who should guess the nearest to her age." "And did she?" "I don't know. I know that she married the one who guessed the lowest."

It Wasn't Cheap.

AGED HUSBAND: "You are going to ruin me with your extravagance. You don't need that cape any more than a cat needs two tails. How often have I told you never to buy anything because it is cheap?" Young Wife (with an air of one who has got the better of the argument): "But it was not cheap; it cost ten guineas!"

A Difficult Question.

SHE was a bride of only three short months, but she had her troubles, and naturally made a confidante of her mother. "My dear child," said the mother, "if you would have neither eyes nor ears when your husband comes home late from the club you might be happier." "Perhaps so," answered the young wife, with an air of weariness, "but what am I to do with my nose?"

Not what was Expected.

"NAOMI," he said softly, as he gazed at the moon above them, "isn't the evening beautiful? Do you know, strange fancies throng my mind on a night like this. Every zephyr seems to bear gentle voices, perhaps from the spirit world. Do you hear such voices?" Silence for a moment. "I think I do, George." "What do they sound like to you?" "They are very indistinct, but they make me think that papa and brother Henry are calling the dog."

The Old Man's Sorrow.

"YOU have a daughter, have you not, sir?" said a minister to an old gentleman, with whom he had formed a casual acquaintance as a fellow-passenger. The old gentleman essayed to answer, but the question had strangely affected him. "I beg your pardon," said the minister, "if I have thoughtlessly awakened in your mind recollections of a painful nature. The world is full of sorrow, sir, and perhaps my question recalls to your memory a fair, beautiful girl, whose blossoming young life had withered in its bloom. Am I right, sir?" "No, not exactly," replied the old gentleman, sadly; "I have five unmarried darters, mister, an' the youngest of the lot is twenty-eight years old."

A Honeymoon Cloud.

"JAMES" was at a seaside watering-place the other day, and met an old college friend, who invited him to dinner, adding, "I'd like you to meet the wife." It appeared that the friend was newly married, and was in fact on his honeymoon. "JAMES" accepted the invitation. While at dinner, he made himself as agreeable as possible to both his friend and his wife, and on leaving thought he had made quite a good impression on the latter from a social point of view.

* * * * *

Later on he thought to return the hospitality, and invited the young couple to dine with him. In reply he had a curt refusal. On inquiry it turned out that "JAMES'" politeness to his wife had deeply offended his friend, his motives having been entirely mistaken. What can "JAMES" do in the matter? He says he was only agreeable to the girl in a social sense, and had no idea whatever of trying to attract her.

* * * * *

Of course, "JAMES," you do not know exactly that your friend has taken offence with you for the reason stated. It is only hearsay. If so, he must be an exceedingly foolish man, who evidently has very little confidence in his friends. You had better write him a nice letter, expressing your disappointment that the couple cannot accept your invitation, add a word of appreciation for their hospitality and let the matter drop. Young married couples are frightfully sensitive in such matters and it requires a very tactful man to avoid causing jealousy.

* * * * *

And, in future, when you again meet a young married couple in their honeymoon stage, have as little to do with them socially as you possibly can. Nine chances out of ten you will arouse the jealousy of one or the other, and probably without the slightest reason.

Unfriendly Sisters.

"FREDA" is engaged and has been introduced to her sweetheart's family. His sisters, however, clearly show that they do not care for her, though she has made herself as agreeable as she could. It looks as though they wish to drive her to break off the match.

* * * * *

You should reply by showing your devotion to be unbreakable. That is an argument even unfriendly sisters cannot resist, and is the only one in your case. When they see that neither you nor their brother have even a thought of breaking off, they will soon come round, and in a very short time will try to make themselves agreeable. They will see that such bickerings must cease, or they will alienate their brother.

The New Venus and Adonis.

How is a man to know when a girl is paying attention to him? "S. D." has been meeting a girl for some little time, but has not made any overtures to her. She, however, never loses an opportunity of speaking to him, and hinting at future meetings.

* * * * *

It looks as though she is fond of you, and not backward in wishing to show it. Be careful, though there is no reason for you to be stand-offish. Take up the attitude of a friend, but avoid committing yourself, unless you are really fond of her yourself.

Women Can't Get on with Him.

I HAVE a gloomy letter from "WEARY," who is thirty-three years old. He complains of the attitude of women towards him. They are cool, and sometimes rude. Any politeness he shows is seldom appreciated, and it seems as though his liking for the society of the sex is evaporating. Can I recommend him a cure for this morbid state?

* * * * *

Probably you are not in good health. A disordered liver often creates in men all sorts of delusions as to the attitude of others towards themselves. That, however, is for you and your doctor to decide. As to your relations with women, if you find you are growing weary of them, why not give the sex a rest altogether for a while?

* * * * *

Both you and the ladies may benefit by an interval. Try a few weeks with your male friends. No man should allow his thoughts to concentrate too much on the opposite sex. Probably you have neglected other men, and therefore lost sight of the consoling influence of friendship.

The Lonely Girl.

"ADA" lives in a quiet country town with an exacting parent. She gets no society at all, and scarcely knows any other girls, much less any members of the male sex. She is twenty, and has not seen any life at all, as her parent will not hear of her accepting invitations to stay with friends. She feels that she is growing gloomy and despondent. What can I suggest to her?

* * * * *

Take plenty of exercise, long walks, cycling, and read as many light and amusing books as you can. Cultivate music or some hobby to distract your thoughts. One of these days something—or somebody—will turn up which will give you the chance you need. Meanwhile, don't let yourself get despondent. It spoils the complexion. I know that will appeal to you probably more than any moralising from me. Besides, young men do come to country towns, and when they see a girl who attracts them, they usually find some way to make her acquaintance.

To Turn Friendship Into Love.

So you are in great perplexity, "X. Y. Z." You are on friendly terms with a gentleman, but you feel more than friendship towards him. How can you attain your desires?

* * * * *

I suppose if he also feels more than friendship towards you he will show it in some way. I should try to give him the opportunity by seeing him as often as possible, without, of course, appearing to throw yourself at him. You may have developed the stronger feelings a little earlier than he has, in which case you will have to wait until he catches you up. Real love usually arrives before mere friendship has had a chance to look in. But there are exceptions, and I hope your own case is one of them.

Telling of How a Photograph Nearly Brought Trouble.

"Good-bye, Cecil, I'm off now."

Fitting on her gloves as she went, little Mrs. Bertram tripped gaily downstairs, and paused at the door of the room where she supposed her husband to be. He was not there, however, so she went across the hall towards his study.

She had only been married six months, and the idea of going out, even only for a few hours, without a good-bye kiss from her husband was simply unthinkable.

The door stood ajar, and peeping in, Nell saw her husband seated before his writing table, looking intently at a photograph, and so absorbed that he did not hear her step as she approached to surprise him with a kiss.

But before the kiss was given Nell started back in burning anger. The photograph which her husband was studying so intently was not hers; it was that of a young and very lovely girl, quite unknown to her.

Now Nell had a temper; those very tiny, sparkling, vivacious girls generally have, and for a six-months' bride to find her husband hanging absorbed over another girl's photograph is enough to rouse the sweetest temper.

The large dark eyes flashed; the fairy hand clenched itself; the sweet little face reddened with anger.

Not trusting herself to speak, she stole softly away, and set out without the coveted good-bye kiss. But as she sat in the carriage with the friend she was taking to the matinée, her mind was on the mysterious photograph, and she returned perfectly random replies to Laura Grant's chatter.

When they reached the theatre it was the same thing. She gazed at the stage with unseeing eyes, and the smartest and wittiest speeches passed her unnoticed. She had never before known jealousy.

Married at nineteen to a man sixteen years her senior, who made her his idol, she had never cast a thought to any other woman who must have had a part in the years of his life before Nell entered it. Who could this woman be?

"Isn't this a pretty scene?" whispered Laura, and Nell, turning lack-lustre eyes on the stage, murmured assent.

The next instant she uttered a half-suppressed exclamation, and sat staring at a girl, who, representing a wood-elf, had just run on. It was the girl of the photograph, but how much more beautiful in life!

The violet eyes, the waves of rich brown hair, the pure Greek profile, the exquisite figure made up a lovely picture, and Nell gazed at her fascinated. Her heart felt like a stone. Was this the explanation of the photograph? Had her noble husband stooped to a low intrigue with an actress?

The matinée over, Laura dropped at her own house, and Nell, once more at home, the weight of her spirits grew heavier. She was so unlike herself that her husband was alarmed, and kept anxiously glancing at her as they sat together after dinner. She would not give him any music, and after sitting silent for some time, jumped up, and stood looking absently into the fire.

"What's wrong, Baby?" he asked, drawing her down on his knee. "Aren't you well, sweetheart?"

Her heart was too full to speak. She made a little grieved mouth like the baby he loved to call her, and hid her face on his shoulder.

"What is it, darling? Do tell me what is wrong, and trust to me to put it right."

She clung round his neck and cried bitterly.

"Oh, Cecil, I have so loved and trusted you," she murmured through her sobs. "How could you deceive me?"

"Deceive you? Why, darling, I have never deceived you, never."

She raised herself suddenly, and looked deep into his eyes; those clear, candid, dark grey eyes.

"Cecil, whose photograph is that you were looking at this morning so intently that you did not hear me come in to say 'Good-bye'? Who is that beautiful girl?"

Cecil crimsoned from brow to chin, put his wife hastily off his knee, and began to pace the room in agitated silence. At last he stopped in front of the chair where Nell sat, a little heap of misery, and picked her up in his arms like a child.

"Little Nell," he said, in a voice of exceeding tenderness, "you must not be jealous of the dead."

Nell started, and looked up incredulously.

"What a jealous Baby it is!" he went on, fondly pressing the little hot, flushed cheek to his own. "Shall I tell you all about the original of that photograph, Nell? I ought to have done so before I married you, perhaps, but I thought it best to 'let the dead past bury its dead.'

"Well, Baby, when I first met Patricia Stanley she was a very young girl, an orphan, and alone in the world except for a sister, a baby three or four years old. I sought the sisters out at their father's request.

"He had saved my life at the cost of his own, and his last words were to ask me to look after his little girls.

"They were very poor, but Patricia refused all help, and I did not know how to assist her. I admired her beauty, but I did not love her, and therefore I did wrong when I asked her to marry me. It was the quixotic act of a very young man, for I was just one-and-twenty."

Nell looked up again quickly. The wood-elf must have been cleverly made up, for she had looked quite a young girl.

"Well, we married."

"What?" broke in Nell, almost screaming. "You married her?"

"Yes. Remember I did not know you then. It is more than fourteen years ago, and you were a real baby then, a tot in the nursery. And I never loved her, Nell; I never loved anyone but you. And she is dead, dear."

Nell tore herself from his arms, and stood facing him, white and rigid.

"You married her," she repeated. "Then, as we live and breathe, Cecil, she is your wife to-day, and I—what am I?"

"But I tell you she is dead, darling."

"And I tell you that if that photograph I saw you looking at this morning represents your first wife, she is alive and well. I saw her myself this very day."

"A chance resemblance. Come, Baby," and he drew her to his arms again, "let me finish, and then we'll forget it all and be happy again. I have not a word to say against Patricia, but we were not suited to each other, and I was not happy. I tried to make her happy, and she loved me, but it was not a union of hearts.

"Shortly after our marriage an uncle of hers died out in Australia, and left her a large fortune, and this place, the Grange, so she would have been well provided for without my marrying her. She made a will then, leaving everything to her sister Violet, who, of course, lived with us, and was a dear little thing, and to me, in case of Violet's death.

"In the second year of our marriage Violet was sent by the doctor to Eastbourne after an attack of bronchitis, and Patricia went with her. The boarding-house where they stayed was burnt to the ground one night, and Patricia, Violet, and the maid were burnt to death."

"How terrible! Then if Violet had lived she would have inherited her sister's property."

"Certainly; and this dear old house we love so much. Poor Patricia, it was a sad fate. And so, as I was looking for some papers this morning, I came upon her photograph, and I felt sad to think that she perished so young, and that I had never loved her. I know how sweet love is, for I love my Nell."

A few days later Nell was told that a young man wished to see her. He had asked first for Mr. Bertram, but learning that he was out, he requested to see Mrs. Bertram. He was a good-looking young fellow, not quite a gentleman, but still with a certain polish of manner and educated speech. Nell asked him to state his business.

"I have reason to believe that my wife is Mr. Bertram's sister," he began.

"Mr. Bertram has no sister," said Nell, frigidly.

"Sister-in-law, then. My name is Taylor—George Taylor. A year ago I married a girl my mother had adopted. More then fourteen years ago my mother, then newly widowed, was staying at Eastbourne with my two-year-old sister.

"The boarding-house where they were staying was burnt out, and little Violet lost her life.

"The nurse was killed too, so when my mother claimed another little girl as her own there was no one to contradict.

"This little one had lost all her people in the fire, and nearly lost her wits too through the fright. She was older than my sister, being quite four or five, but she could say nothing about herself beyond that her name was Violet.

"I was at school at the time, but of course I knew that the child wasn't my sister, though my mother told me nothing about her then. We're a theatrical family, and Violet seemed to take to the boards quite naturally.

"When my mother was dying some months ago, she told me she knew who Violet was, only she was so desperate at losing her own little one that she had resolved never to give her up. She told me all she knew, and I have been making inquiries ever since. Recently I have discovered that Mr. Bertram is Violet's brother-in-law."

During this long speech Nell's mind had been rapidly working. If Violet Stanley were alive, Violet Stanley was the mistress of the Grange, and owner of quite half Cecil's income. If Cecil knew of her existence, he would at once hand over house and money to her. Therefore, he must never know it.

"This is a somewhat far-fetched story," she remarked superciliously, "and very—very theatrical. Such things do not occur in real life. But even supposing your wife should be the sister of my husband's late wife, what then? She had no claim on him."

"No legal claim, of course," admitted Taylor. "But—we are very poor. I am resting at present, and my wife's pay is very small. I thought—perhaps—when can I see Mr. Bertram?"

"My husband is abroad," said Nell very sharply, "so you can't see him, and I shan't give you his address. He shan't be worried by you; but if a ten-pound note will be of any use to you, here it is."

Taylor gratefully accepted the money, and withdrew, leaving Nell to plume herself on the address with which she had managed the affair and finally disposed of it. She had yet to learn:

What a tangled web we weave
When first we practise to deceive.

A few weeks had passed without a sign from Taylor, when, one evening a note was brought to her, which proved to be from the young actor, asking for more money, and hinting that he had suspicions his wife was entitled to property from her sister.

"What's wrong, Baby?" asked Cecil, glancing up from his newspaper. "You look queer. From whom is that letter?"

"From Taylor," she replied absently. "From my dressmaker, I mean."

"Is it a bigger bill than poor Baby's dress-allowance will cover?" laughed her husband. "And would she like a little cheque to help out?"

"Oh, I should, Cecil!" came in tones more earnest than he was prepared for. "Oh, I should be glad of it!"

"I'll write one to-morrow, then. I don't like to see Baby's brow puckered like that. Or—let me have the bill, and I'll settle it for you. That will be best." He extended his hand to take the paper she held, but Nell hastily threw it into the fire, and, flushed and tearful, turned to face her husband.

"What does this mean, Nell?" he asked in a changed voice. "Why am I not to see that bill? Is it a bill at all? Are you deceiving me?"

Nell burst into tears, which naturally did not soothe her husband.

"That does no good, Nell. I must have a full explanation of your conduct. I don't want to be suspicious, but your manner is so extraordinary, and you have been so unlike yourself these last few days that I can't helping seeing there is something wrong. Now, trust me, dear, and tell me all about it."

But Nell sobbed on helplessly, and though he was wonderfully patient and tender with her, he could get no explanation. Consequently, relations were somewhat strained for the next few days, and the promised cheque was not forthcoming.

Another letter came from Taylor to say that Violet was seriously ill, and he must press for assistance from Mrs. Bertram. He said he was making inquiries as to what claims Violet had to her sister's property, and insisted on seeing Mr. Bertram, who must now have returned from abroad.

Driven frantic, Nell dispatched all the money she had in the house, and wrote that her husband had gone to Australia, and would not return under six months.

She hoped by this letter to free herself from Taylor's importunities for some time to come; but barely a week had passed—a week of miserable estrangement between husband and wife—when, as she sat down to lunch a message was brought her that a Mr. Taylor wished to speak with her on pressing business.

Cecil watched the little face opposite him change to a vivid scarlet, and then to a deadly white, but he said nothing. In a hurried undertone Nell sent word that she would be with Mr. Taylor in a few minutes.

"Who is it wishes to see you?" asked her husband quietly, and, as she stammered out a few incoherent words, he continued, "Your dressmaker, perhaps. She seems a formidable person. Do not keep her waiting."

Taylor was pacing the room impatiently when Mrs. Bertram entered it.

"Violet is dying!" he said abruptly. "Pneumonia has set in, and the doctor gives no hope. Curiously enough her memory has come back to her after lying dormant all these years. She remembers Mr. Bertram perfectly, and longs to see him, but, as that cannot be, she wishes to see you."

"To see me. Oh, no, I cannot come!"

"You cannot refuse the prayer of a dying girl. I have promised to take you back with me."

"I can't! I really can't! It's impossible!"

"Impossible to refuse, you mean. Get ready quickly and come with me."

And, overborne by the man's strength of will, Nell yielded.

"Wait a moment. I will get ready and come with you directly," she said, turning to the door, which opened before she could touch the handle, and Cecil stood there.

"And may I ask who is this gentleman with whom you are going away?" asked the cold, clear voice.

Nell collapsed on a couch and began to cry. Cecil turned to the young man.

"Perhaps you will kindly inform me why Mrs. Bertram is going with you, and what your business is here?" he said sternly.

Taylor looked at him uncertainly.

"I don't know what right you have to ask," he began, "This lady——"

"This lady is my wife," said Cecil briefly.

Taylor looked bewildered.

"Mr. Bertram? Have you returned from Australia then?"

"Australia? Never was in Australia in my life. What do you mean?"

"I thought it was Australia," replied Taylor meekly; "but perhaps it was America. Anyhow, Mrs. Bertram said you were abroad and weren't coming home under six months, so——"

"Mrs. Bertram said?—Nell said?" gasped Cecil. "Oh, this is madness. There isn't a gleam of reason in the whole affair. I don't know who you are, but there's something here that wants a lot of explanation, and I mean to have it. My wife won't speak, so you've got to. Now, explain."

And Taylor explained.

There was a dead silence when he had finished. Nell simply dared not look at her husband, and she shivered as his voice, cold as ice, cleft the silence.

"I will come with you at once, Taylor, and see my poor little sister. We must have better medical advice. Come!"

Without a word to his wife, Cecil left the room with Taylor, leaving Nell utterly crushed.

"He'll never forgive me!" she moaned. "I've told him too many lies. I used to think I could never be so mean as to say what wasn't true, but directly I'm really tempted I tell lies like — like — oh, Ananias and Sapphira simply aren't in it with me. Cecil can never forgive me, and directly he comes back he'll turn me out. I'd better go at once. I dare say Aunt Hattie will take me in."

But Nell was too spent with weeping to make any move for some time, and it was quite three hours later that she was crawling broken-heartedly along the deserted road to the nearest station, the rain beating down on her defenceless head, for in her flight from her outraged husband she had not thought of anything so unromantic as an umbrella.

A man driving past in a station fly glanced out at the forlorn little figure, uttered an exclamation, and in another minute Nell found herself in her husband's arms.

"Where are you going?" he asked anxiously; and a few sobbing words made him understand the situation. "You sweet idiot!" he went on, "you silly baby, come, jump into here, and we'll get home in no time. Why, you're soaked, you naughty child! There, now we're off, and you shall have the scolding you deserve. Aren't you ashamed of yourself, Nell?"

"Oh, I am—I am! But, tell me, Cecil, is Violet dead?"

"Not she, getting on all right, the doctors say. Nell, you need not trouble to explain. I know all about it. You thought if Violet were alive she would have the Grange, and you didn't want me to lose it. Well, if you had come straight to your husband like a sensible girl instead of getting all tangled up in a web of deceit, your mind would have been relieved at once.

"Patricia left everything to Violet with a reversion to me in case of her sister's death, but she stipulated that Violet was not to marry before she was twenty-five. If she did so she forfeited the Grange entirely, and was to inherit twenty thousand pounds only—a nice little sum with which she is quite satisfied. Now, Baby, promise never to tell fibs again, and we'll kiss and be friends, and you shall never hear another word about your naughtiness from me."

And Nell was so overcome by this unlooked-for generosity that she could only cling round her husband's neck in a mute embrace more eloquent than words.

A Race for Happiness.

Telling of a Bicycle Ride and the Winning of a Wife.

"I'm afraid poor old Uncle Herbert is really going to make a 'die' of it this time," my chum Westropp said as he stuffed a letter he had just re-read back into its envelope again. "Phyllis writes me he isn't expected to live through the week."

"Well, I suppose, old chap," said I, "that he'll leave you his fortune, and then all your scruples about marrying an heiress will be overcome. Phyllis Westropp's a pretty name," I added musingly as I lay back in my armchair and watched my cigarette smoke curling out through the window into the summer night air.

"Don't be a fool," said Westropp; then, after a long pause, which I believe he utilised to cover an incipient blush, "Uncle Herbert's such a queer old chap, he changes his mind about the property once a month; it must cost him a perfect fortune in wills. One month I'm to have the old place and the next it's that fellow Lawton—nice mess he'll make of it too if he gets it."

"Anyway he can't will the beautiful Phyllis away."

"Of course he can't, but don't you see if I'm a pauper that won't help me much; I'd rather sweep a crossing than propose to a girl with £10,000 a year."

"Well, I've discussed that point till I'm sick of you and your affairs. Pass the whisky; thanks! All I know is that if I was in love with an heiress and was pretty sure she cared for me I'd give up all idea of amateur crossing sweeping."

It was a lovely night last June that the above conversation took place; we had finished dinner in the pretty little flat in South Kensington that my chum and I occupied conjointly.

A long pause ensued after my last remark—one of those pauses that are the proofs of true friendship, and then Westropp started the everlasting topic—bicycle! He and I had just invested in a new tandem, and we had done some very excellent times on it; we—though I say it who shouldn't—were both first-class riders, and we went splendidly in double harness, so much so that a prominent cycling firm had offered to give us a machine if we would try to break some road records for them.

We talked on for about an hour, discussing gears, pedals, saddles, records, and such like, and the clock had just struck eleven when the maid brought in a telegram and handed it to my companion; he glanced over it, and then handed it to me. It ran—

"Come at once. My guardian can't last out night. Says he will leave property to whichever nephew arrives first.

"PHYLLIS."

Scarcely had I put down the pinky-brown paper when the door opened and Mr. Lawton was announced. He nodded curtly to us and then at the telegram.

"Oh, you've got one too," he said. "Pity, isn't it, Westropp, that the last train for Oxford has left Paddington," and he smiled maliciously at us. It was an open secret that my chum and he detested one another.

"May I ask to what cause I may attribute the pleasure of your visit?" Westropp said sarcastically, as he indicated a chair.

"Oh, I only just popped in on my way down to Oxford to see how you'd take the idea of being too late."

"Well, you might have saved yourself the trouble and me the annoyance. Good-night."

"All right, I'm just off; but I flattered myself you'd enjoy hearing how I'm going to manage this little biz. You've heard of Doyen, of course, one of the crack cycling 'pros.'? Well, he's waiting outside with a tandem, and he and I are going to Oxford by road. Pity you've not got a 'pro.' up your sleeve too."

"Get out!" said Westropp, rising to his feet and pointing to the door, and Lawton got out, but as he reached the hall door he stopped, and called back—

"By the way, I heard you were rather good on a cycle, and as I saw two singles in the outside hall I took the precaution of cutting the tyres open. I owed you a grudge for cutting me out with the beautiful Phyllis, and I came round to-night to pay it you in full. So long," and this loathsome young fellow shut the door and clattered down the stairs, four at a time.

We looked at one another aghast for a minute, and then we both ejaculated together:

"Lucky he didn't know we had a tandem."

"We'll break the London-Oxford record to-night, anyhow," I said a few minutes later as I was changing out of my smoking jacket into a cycling costume.

"Begorra, we'll teach that spalpeen to ride," ejaculated Westropp through a shirt into which he was struggling. My chum always lapsed into his native Irish brogue in moments of excitement.

Five minutes later we were in the saddle, and as we flew past the church in the Earl's Court Road the clock struck half-past eleven. Lawton had ten minutes' start. We were going by the Henley route, as old General Lambert's house was on that road, some three miles out of Oxford.

We were just getting into full swing as we passed Olympia, and our ninety-six gear was spinning round with a delightful churning-grinding noise. The few policemen we passed blew their whistles right lustily.

"Bedad, and it'll take a steam roller all its time to stop this old 'yoke' now. Fancy you a-thrying to stop it with a sax-penny whistle!" shouted Westropp, as we left one of these disgusted 'Bobbys' behind us.

"That's it, lad, that's it! Run like the dickens and begorra! we'll make the pace for you down to Hounslow!" he cried to a more active member of the force who gave chase. "Sure that man was too 'low-geared' to 'take us on,'" he added to me as the discomfited Peeler slowed up and resumed his majestic dot-and-carry-one walk.

Hammersmith, Gunnersbury, Kew, and Brentford came up one by one out of the darkness, winked at us with dirty yellow gas lamps, and then dropped behind. We were exhilarated by the lovely night air, and the head wind only got our "danders" up and made us work the harder.

Swishity-swishity-swishity-swish! And the grand old tandem seemed to waken to life beneath us like some thoroughbred steeplechaser determined to win the race for its master.

A cloud of dust got up behind our back wheel and gave chase all along the road. "Hounslow—ten miles in twenty-three minutes!" Westropp yelled into my ear as we streaked past the clock.

"Now for a pacy seven miles," I cry, as we clear the fork roads, and we bring every muscle of our bodies into play; gradually our heads get down lower and lower, and the strain on my arms and shoulders (I am steering) becomes well-nigh unendurable as the pace increases.

Faster and faster and faster we go until the "swishity-swish" of our ninety-six gear fades into the everlasting "t—s—s—s—s" of what might be a sixty-geared machine.

Colnbrook and Slough leave Buckinghamshire to meet us—twenty miles in forty-six minutes! The very pace we cleave the air is beginning to tell and on the front seat I gasp for air, and I can hear Westropp's breath coming in gasps.

Three of the young bloods of the place who are going home arm in arm to steady themselves greet us with "A bicycle built for two," but we are out of earshot before they can hiccough out the second line.

As the last house of the long straggling town fades out of sight I can just make out a shadow moving along the road a few hundred yards ahead—another half minute and we can make out a tandem by the aid of the full moon.

An extra pressure on the pedal and we are riding abreast of our rivals! Lawton swears softly in gasps, and the Frenchman bites a "Sacré-bleu!" off his tongue and settles himself down to race.

"Come on, you brutes, if ye're coming," Westropp ejaculates, and they do come on—they pass us—we pick them up; they forge ahead again—we ride abreast, and I can see the perspiration on the Frenchman's eyelids gather in thick drops and run down his cheek; and so neck and neck we race on, through Taplow and across the sleeping Thames, through Maidenhead, and now Castle Hill bars our way.

The pedals go round perceptibly slower as the steep ascent and rough surface begin to kill our pace. Every muscle is strained to the utmost; the Frenchman seems to be licking the dust off his front tyre.

On, on, through the night we four men race for a woman and a fortune. Hedges, gates, cottages and trees skim past unnoticed.

Another terrific hill leaves us panting and aching in every fibre some twenty yards ahead; but Doyen isn't to be beaten. He remembers the Bordeaux-Paris race he won last year, and we rush, bump, and skid down Henley hill side by side, through the peacefully sleeping town, and out again into the moonlit country.

"Thirty-four miles in an hour and twenty-four minutes," Westropp tells me as we settled down to the "Fair Mile."

"Surely we've broken some record!" I think, but haven't breath to say.

Side by side the two tandems start to negotiate the three miles of up hill to Nettlebed. The perspiration is running from us in streams.

How we reach the apex of the Chilterns I cannot tell. I only know that the four of us are working out our souls, and the live steel beneath me seems to leap with joy as we rush down a steep decline

We leave the last slope of the Chilterns, and Doyen and Lawton make a final sprint. They are going to pieces now; instead of the even push-and-pull they are jerking their cranks round.

As they gradually move past us I hear Lawton whisper to his companion in French, "I'm done! We can't beat them! We must upset them!"

I translate to Westropp and grasp my handles firmly. Now at last my trick-riding will be of some avail. Many a time in my volunteer corps have I practised riding over supposed wounded men. I grind my teeth as we draw nearer to our rivals and increase the pace.

"Now, lad, show the craytures what you can do, and the Lord be with us all!" And I can hear my chum's teeth snap together as he nerves himself to the ordeal.

We are riding six inches to the right and to the rear of our rivals. Suddenly I hear their brake scream against their tyres and they make a half-right turn.

Crash! Bang! Crash! A thud! A muttered oath! Our noble yoke leaps in the air! I hold on for dear life. A bump and a rattle, and—we are over them and safe.

"Lord, lad, you can ride!" and Westropp's hand on my shoulder is like a vice. I take my hand off the handlebars and put it in his—no need for words, we understand what is in each other's hearts.

A hundred yards behind the moon is shining on a mass of crumpled tubes and twisted steel, and I can just make out two dark forms huddled together on the hard white road.

Mile posts come running up like baby ghosts as we spin along through Benson, Dorchester, and Nuneham. We turn up a wide avenue and glide noiselessly up to a fine old manor house. We throw ourselves off to the right, and the tandem falls to the left. Westropp leaps up to the porch and rings the bell.

Phyllis herself opens it and the light in the hall seems to make a halo of her silky-golden hair.

"Thank Heaven, Terence, you're in time." I see him take her hand, and bend his head down close to hers, and then I see—that our lamp is smoking, and that the dear old machine would be all the better for a little oil.

How long I stood out there in the shrubbery I do not know. The old house brought back many memories of my Oxford days when Terence and I were up at college together.

'Twas under yonder elm two years ago that my chum had first confided in me his love for Phyllis. I remember it as if it were yesterday. Aye, and I remember the fierce struggle in my breast as I had pressed his hand and wished him "Good luck!" Since that day I hadn't seen Phyllis again.

As I stand leaning on the machine that has carried us so well I hear a voice by my side that brings me back from my memories, and a dainty little hand is placed in mine, and I am looking down into two soft brown eyes.

"Terence has just told me what you have done for him—for us"—and a blush suffuses her soft velvet skin—"this evening, Mr. Cuthbert, and I'm going to thank you as best I can. You may kiss me if you like," and she frankly offers a dimpled cheek that sets the blood racing through my veins. I feel that I have tasted the greatest joy of my life. My exertions have been paid for a million times.

"Congratulate me, old man, on having won the sweetest little woman in the world, thanks to you. God bless you, lad!"

"Allow me to congratu——" I try to pull myself together. "I'm awfully glad," I add tamely, as I turn my head to gaze down the drive.

"Well, you don't seem in the least pleased! Hang it, man, you might show a little more enthusiasm!" and he places a hand on my shoulder and we stand face to face. His steel blue eyes change from wrath to wonder at what they read in mine. "Good Heavens! What's the matter, Reggie! What do you mean?"

"Nothing, old chap; only don't ask me to be 'best man,' that's all." I take his arm, and I notice that the blood is trickling from a cruel bite in his lower lip, as we go silently back into the house together.

THE MYSTERY OF ADAM BARR.

An Editor's Love Story.

BASIL MAYNE sat in the editor's chair at the offices of the Grecian Magazine. There was plenty of work to be done, and he was not the man to shirk it.

Healthy, active, intellectual, Basil Mayne was at two-and-thirty as fine a specimen of mankind as could be met with in the vicinity of Fleet Street. He was handsome too, and yet, despite this additional charm to his already striking personality, he was still a bachelor.

Not that he advocated the wisdom of celibacy. Indeed, he had arrived at that age when the inefficiencies of the genus housekeeper make a man desirous of changing his condition. There is but one antidote for this disease, and Basil Mayne did not deny its efficacy. But as yet he had not prescribed it for himself.

He had just laid down his pen for a momentary respite when the door opened, and the sub. entered the sanctum.

"Here is another story from Joan Barr," he said, "which, if I am not mistaken, will confirm your former opinion of her ability."

Basil Mayne took the MS. in question, and glanced quickly over the first page.

"It begins well," he said.

"And ends better," added the sub. with enthusiasm.

"But who is this Joan Barr?" said Basil, knitting his brows and mentally cataloguing the known writers of the day.

"That I cannot discover," replied the sub. "She appears to be quite unknown as yet. But that will probably not last long, for her stories will bear comparison with any on the market."

"I think you are right, Weston," said the editor thoughtfully. "At least, so far as her former story is concerned. I have yet to read this." And he touched the neatly-typed MS. which lay on the table. "By the way," he added, after a pause, "did any communication accompany it?"

"Yes," replied the sub. "I will send it in." And he withdrew from the room.

Basil Mayne picked up the MS. and began to read. Before he had come to the end of the first quarto sheet his attention was riveted on the story. Every passage bore the hall-mark of truth. Every incident stood out in bold relief.

Humour and pathos tripped one upon the other in the fresh, crisp sentences which followed each other in such harmonious sequence.

The whole story was real—unmistakably and intensely real—and that carried him on, through page after page, till, with a sigh, he came to the last word and leant back in his chair with a glow of pleasure on his handsome face.

"The woman's a genius!" he said admiringly. "I suppose it is a woman, though the name may be a pseudonym. I wonder who she is."

His eye fell on the letter which the sub. had sent in. He took it up and examined it critically. It was written in a clear, feminine hand, and ran as follows:

"Ivy Lodge, Finchwood, Surrey.

"Dear Sir,—The gratifying reception accorded to my previous contribution to the Grecian Magazine has induced me to submit a second for your kind consideration.

"Should this also suit your requirements I shall be happy to hear from you in the usual way.—Yours very truly,

"JOAN BARR."

Basil smiled.

"A practical business letter," he said musingly, "with no more words than are necessary. I wish all my correspondents were as considerate of an editor's time." And he glanced whimsically at a pile of unread communications which lay on the table beside him.

"But who, in the name of fortune, is this Joan Barr? Surely she is no mere novice, taking her first plunge into the stormy sea of literature? If so, she has little to learn from experience. But I must find out. It might be a good thing for the Grecian. Something permanent might be arranged, and then—— I'll drop her a line and ask her to run up to town."

He took a sheet of paper from the rack before him and prepared to write. But just as his pen touched the paper he paused, and, pushing it from him, said:

"No—I'm hanged if I do! I'll run down to Finchwood myself, and try to get a glimpse of this rising star in the firmament of literature. I'll go incog. too, and perhaps, if I'm lucky, obtain an introduction to Miss Joan Barr; though how that is to be accomplished Heaven only knows!"

He rose.

"Pooh!" he muttered. "What an ass I am! For all I know, she may be a middle-aged spinster or the curate's wife, or some other, to me, uninteresting specimen of womanhood. Well, if so, I can come back. In any case a week-end in the little Surrey village of Finchwood will do me more good than harm these bright Spring days. So I'll go. That's settled."

He seated himself once more in the editorial chair and gave himself up to the business of the day. But throughout it all the name of Joan Barr stared at him persistently from the title-page of the MS. which lay on his table. Nor did it forsake him when he put on his hat at the close of the day's work and returned to his house in Highgate and the remainder of his housekeeper's inefficiencies.

The afternoon was well advanced when, the following Saturday, Basil Mayne alighted at the little Surrey station of Finchwood. The meadows were yellow with cowslips and primroses, over which the cool Spring breeze gambolled, and mingled with its own freshness their fragrance.

Exhilaration was in the very air, and Basil Mayne was not the man to be unconscious of its influence.

He walked along the white, winding country road with a light, elastic step, and was soon standing at the door of the village inn—called by courtesy a "hotel"—where arrangements for his accommodation were speedily effected. Then, after a cup of tea, he lit a cigar and sauntered out in search of Ivy Lodge.

It is more than probable this task might have been much more difficult than one might imagine, for he wished, if possible, to avoid any inquiry as to its situation, in order that the object of his visit, as well as his identity, might not thereby reach the ear of Joan Barr.

What he wanted was to meet this unknown woman who wrote with such intense realism and purity of thought and diction, not as the editor of the Grecian, but as a casual visitor to the little village.

He wanted, in short, to take her off her guard. Precisely why he wanted this he did not stop to inquire; and, even had he done so, the result would, in all probability, have been the same.

But Fortune favoured him.

He had just turned into a shady lane when his eye rested on a small, exquisitely-kept cottage, over which the trailing ivy spread its dark-green leaves and clinging tendrils till every trace of stone or brick was lost to view.

A little garden stood in front, tastefully arranged and fragrant with sweet Spring flowers. And on the low wooden gate which led within, and opened from the lane, Basil Mayne read the inscription, "Ivy Lodge."

He passed the house at a leisurely pace, his eye taking in every detail of its appearance, from the pretty gilt vane upon the roof to the neatly-trimmed box-borders of the flower garden.

"Modest," was his inward comment, "but decidedly tasteful. Not too neat to be prim, but just enough to be 'home.' Ah, what a thing it is to live in a home, and not a 'desirable residence!'" And he sighed as he went on past the pretty little cottage and down the quiet country lane.

Presently he turned and retraced his steps. It was growing dusk now, and a soft, serene hush lay, like an angel's wing, over the smiling landscape—a hush which the jubilant singing of wood birds among the trees served only to intensify.

Stopping before the gate of Ivy Lodge, and partly screened by the tall hedge which inclosed the garden, Basil Mayne looked once more at the cottage within.

As he did so, the graceful figure of a girl came out from behind the hedge and approached the gate. She started when she saw him and hesitated. The last lingering light of evening shone full on her face, and Basil was struck by its rare and sensitive beauty.

Most men of his age would have experienced a feeling of embarrassment at being thus discovered. But Basil Mayne, in his intercourse with the world, had learnt that art of perfect self-possession which, when acquired, lends both charm and dignity to the character. Lifting his hat, therefore, and with a frank, winning smile on his handsome face, he said:

"If to sin with one member is to sin with all, I am afraid you have discovered me in the act of trespassing. I trust I may be pardoned, however, for admiring what is so inexpressibly beautiful."

He waved his hand indicatively to the tastefully-arranged flower-beds, but his eyes still rested on the lovely face of the girl before him. A soft flush deepened the delicate beauty of her cheek at the subtle, gracefully-veiled compliment of the tall, handsome stranger, and her eyes fell.

"I am glad our little garden affords pleasure to others as well as ourselves," she said. "But," deprecatingly, "it is so very small!"

"Perhaps that is one of its chief attractions," said Basil quietly, while the girl looked at him wonderingly. "One often sees a cottage which is more pleasing to the eye than the lordliest palace. And possibly the same truth is responsible for both these apparent incongruities, since the loveliness of a spot and the sweet influences of a home are not determined by their superficial area."

The girl looked up brightly, the large eyes expressing their appreciation of Basil's words.

"Perhaps you have experienced the beauty of both influences?" she said timidly, and then blushed at the boldness of the implied question.

Basil Mayne smiled, and a moment later sighed.

"The first—yes," he said; "for, with two good eyes in one's head, it was impossible to do otherwise. But the second is not so readily acquired, and, having hitherto escaped me, I am compelled to worship from afar."

The girl felt his eyes upon her, and turned away her head.

"I am afraid this is very unconventional," Basil continued with a return to his genial manner. "But I trust you will pardon my apparent presumption and blame, not me, but the irresistible loveliness which seems so peculiar a characteristic of this ideal spot." And, once more lifting his hat and courteously inclining his head, he moved away.

As he did so the door of the little cottage opened, and a deep, manly voice called:

"Joan! Joan!"

"Ah!" murmured Basil to himself, "so my fair contributor is neither a middle-aged spinster nor a curate's wife! Well, so much the better!"

The next day being Sunday, the landlord of the inn found leisure from his accustomed duties to converse with his guest. He was exceedingly communicative, and from him Basil Mayne learnt many things. Breakfast over, the latter offered his cigar-case to the attentive landlord, and, after one or two purposeless observations, casually remarked:

"By the way, to whom does that pretty little cottage known as Ivy Lodge belong? I passed it in the course of my walk last evening, and could not help remarking its aspect of freshness and homeliness."

The landlord's countenance assumed a solemn expression.

"Ah!" he said in a whisper, "there's a mystery about him. Adam Barr he calls himself, sir, though folks do say it might be anything else for all we know. He come here about six year ago from nobody knows where, takes and shuts himself up in Ivy Lodge, and—excepting a 'Good-morning,' or a 'Good-evening,' never speaks to nobody."

"Perhaps he prefers solitude," suggested Basil.

"Then he didn't ought to grumble," retorted the landlord, "for he gets it, year in and year out. All the six year he's lived in Finchwood he's never put his foot in my bar! Solitood!" grunted the landlord indignantly. "Well, let them as likes it have it. But I likes a man to be sociable-like—what you London gen'lmen calls 'greengarious'—that's what I likes!"

"I don't doubt it," said Basil innocently. "But you see we are what Nature has formed us, and we must not be too hard on a man because, in this respect, he shows himself to be less enlightened than you or I."

The landlord thoughtfully caressed his ample chin and appeared somewhat mollified.

"Well, there may be something in that," he said. "But he's a queer character for all that. He goes up to London now and then, and always carries a suspicious-looking black bag along with him. Sometimes he's gone for two or three days, but mostly he catches the night train, stays overnight in London, and comes back the next morning."

The landlord looked significantly at his visitor.

"So his work's done in the night," he said in a low, impressive voice. "And he takes precious good care to keep it to himself. Nobody knows where he goes or what he does, and there are some as say out plain that Adam Barr's bread is not got honest."

Basil Mayne puffed thoughtfully at his cigar.

"That is scarcely a charitable view of the matter," he said.

The landlord looked suspicious.

"Perhaps you're a friend of his?" he suggested.

"Not I!" replied Basil with a laugh. "But, tell me, has he any family? I thought I saw a young lady in the garden yesterday."

The landlord's face brightened perceptibly.

"Ah!" he said enthusiastically, "and as sweet a flower as ever lived among us! She's his daughter Joan, and wonderful clever she be, too! I heard the schoolmaster say t'other day she'd taken to writing for the big London papers. She's a kind word and a smile for everyone, sir, and we're all proud of her—every man Jack of us!

"Of course, she's far and away above the likes of us, but she never makes us feel it when she's talking to us, like the parson's wife and daughters. She's a lady—that's what she is!"

There was a pleased light in Basil Mayne's eyes as he listened to this glowing and evidently sincere eulogy of the girl in whom, within the past few days, he had taken so strong and unaccountable an interest—an interest generated at first by purely business considerations, but which, now that he had seen her, was fast developing into a more ardent sentiment.

"The girl has no mother," went on the landlord with a sigh; "and, except for one servant—who knows as little about her master as we do, sir—Adam Barr and his sweet young daughter live quite alone at Ivy Lodge."

Basil Mayne put on his hat and, going out, sauntered leisurely along the quiet country lanes, speculating as he went as to the possible nature of the occupation which had bred such unqualified suspicion and distrust in the minds of the villagers towards Adam Barr.

Mechanically he wandered in the direction of Ivy Lodge, and presently saw approaching him the graceful figure of Joan on her way to church.

He was not the man to take undue advantage of the fortunate circumstance which had led to their conversation of the previous day. So he merely acknowledged her in passing, and was rewarded by a gracious smile in return.

But that evening chance again led him across her path; this time on the outskirts of the village, and, their direction being the same, Basil asked to be allowed to accompany her.

Thus, step by step, the chance meeting by the little low gate of Ivy Lodge ripened slowly but surely into an intimacy as welcome to one as the other; and Basil Mayne became a frequent visitor to the little village of Finchwood.

But everywhere he heard the same dark rumours of Adam Barr, the same covert hints as to the nature of his occupation, and although they lacked foundation, no answer, explanation or refutation was forthcoming to effectually silence the universal suspicion.

Basil had, in the village, adopted the name of Bernard May, for, as yet, he did not wish his identity as editor of the Grecian to become known to Joan Barr. It was more than possible his own name was known to her in that capacity, whilst the one he had assumed was an old pen name which he had several times used to sign his American contributions.

So the months sped by and acquaintanceship ripened into friendship, and friendship into love, under the genial warmth of the all-developing sun and the softening influence of the summer moon.

But still no solution came to the problem:

"Who is Adam Barr?"

* * * *

One evening in August, Basil Mayne and Joan Barr were sauntering together through some old woods on the outskirts of the village. Few of their walks now were the outcome of chance, and this one had been prearranged at Basil's earnest request.

For some time they walked along in silence, and then, stopping suddenly, Basil took the girl's hand in his, and, with quiet, steady earnestness, said—

"Joan, I cannot longer keep silence. For months past—from the very day when I—a stranger in Finchwood—saw you standing in the dusk by the gate of your garden—I have loved you with an intensity of which I had before never believed myself capable. And now there is but one hope in my heart, the hope that you, who have won my love, will consent to become my wife."

The girl's eyes drooped, but, lifting them for an instant, Basil saw the happy light that shone in their blue depths, and his heart bounded with exultation.

"Joan," he said tenderly, "may I hope that the love I thus yield to you is not without its response in your own heart?"

The little hand trembled in his as, lifting her eyes, she said—

"I have loved you from the first, Bernard."

Basil smiled as he heard the name.

"I am afraid," he said, "I must plead guilty to a little innocent deception. My name is not Bernard May."

Joan looked up in unmistakable surprise.

"Not—Bernard—May?" she said in bewilderment.

"You have never even inquired who or what I am," he said banteringly, smiling down into the lovely face. "Truly, love is blind!"

Joan lifted her head proudly.

"I knew you were a gentleman," she said simply, "and I left the rest to you."

Basil stooped and kissed her tenderly, almost reverently.

"God keep me worthy of such love!" he said earnestly. "No, Joan, my name is not Bernard May, that is a pen name I have adopted, my real name is Basil Mayne."

"Basil Mayne!" exclaimed Joan in surprise. "Not—not the editor of—the Grecian?"

"Yes, dear," said Basil, laughing at her bewilderment. "I ought not, perhaps, to have concealed it from you, but my first visit to Finchwood was made solely with a view to seeing, and, if possible, speaking with you, and, if the result were favourable, to open the negotiations, which have since been satisfactorily concluded, to secure for the Grecian the inestimable advantage of your literary co-operation.

"I did not, for many reasons, wish to be known to you, and it has since been a difficult matter to tell you. Thus, you see, we have the somewhat startling phenomenon of Commerce as the mother of Cupid!" And he smiled into the upturned face. Then he drew her towards him. "Am I forgiven?" he asked.

A look answered him, and he pressed the hand that lay in his.

Presently they turned and walked slowly in the direction of the village.

"I must call on your father to-morrow," said Basil meditatively.

The girl's face became grave.

"I hope he will be nice to you," she said. "But he is so reserved, and never converses with anyone but me."

Basil looked at the girl as she finished speaking.

"I have gathered as much from the villagers," he said quietly. "I wonder if you will think me unpardonably curious if I ask what your father is."

A look of perplexity, almost of anxiety, came into Joan's face.

"I really do not know," she said. "The subject is never mentioned between us. He goes occasionally to London by the night train, and generally returns in the morning, and, though I know these irregular excursions are in some way connected with his business, I am ignorant of its nature.

"He always has enough money, but by what means it is obtained I know no more than you. Once I questioned him on the subject, but he evaded it with so much persistency that I have never repeated it. He is my father, and I trust him. I know he loves me very dearly, and that is all I wish to know." And she looked resolutely into the face of her lover.

Basil lightly changed the conversation, and returned to the subject of their love. It was late when they reached the gate of Ivy Lodge, where he bade good-night to his promised wife, and returned to his inn, pondering still more deeply upon the mystery surrounding Adam Barr.

The following morning he rang the bell of Ivy Lodge, and a moment later found himself, for the first time, in the presence of Adam Barr. He was a tall, squarely-built man, with iron-grey hair and clear blue eyes, which now and then clouded over with an expression of deep melancholy. Quietly and briefly Basil Mayne explained the nature of his errand, and waited for a reply.

"Mr. Mayne," said Adam Barr sadly, "I have long foreseen this, and, could I have done so, would have averted it. I am afraid you have, in your love for Joan, overlooked the fact that, deservedly or otherwise, her father is the possessor of an unenviable reputation."

Basil Mayne looked straight into the old man's eyes, which returned his gaze unflinchingly.

"I will trust you for that," he said confidently, and impulsively held out his hand. But, to his surprise, Adam Barr drew back.

"My hand is not fit to touch yours," he said, turning away.

For a moment Basil stood watching the old man in unqualified astonishment.

"Pardon me," he said at last, "but your appearance does not confirm your statement. Yet such a confession is scarcely one which a man might involuntarily make without good reason."

"Unfortunately for both you and Joan, it is but too irretrievably true," replied Adam Barr sadly. "Nay, more, for, did you know what these hands of mine do, you would shrink from me."

Again Basil was silent, bewildered by the old man's words. Presently, however, he roused himself.

"May I know," he said steadily, "the nature of this dishonest or unlawful work which occupies you? The revelation would be safe with me."

Adam Barr lifted his head proudly.

"It is neither dishonest nor unlawful," he said shortly.

Basil was becoming more and more bewildered each instant.

"Pardon me," he said, "but your words admit of no other construction. If it be neither dishonest nor unlawful, for what reason should I, to adopt your own phrase, 'shrink' from you?"

"That," said the old man, "must ever remain my secret. I love my daughter far too well to risk her happiness by revealing it to one who might inadvertenly transfer it to her."

A graver shade came into Basil Mayne's face.

"Mr. Barr," he said, with emphatic earnestness, "if you withhold your consent to your daughter's union with me, you will not risk, but destroy her happiness, and you will also seriously imperil the love which she bears you.

"You have chosen to make me the recipient of a partial confidence where none was asked or required. Were you the most loathsome and abhorrent of all God's creatures my love for Joan would be in no wise affected or diminished."

For a moment Adam Barr gazed at the earnest, impassioned face of the man before him. The nobility and resolution of his words had touched him to the heart.

"Mr. Mayne," he said at last, "I will not stand in the way of your object, and in this I earnestly hope I am doing right. But lest the knowledge I hold in my breast some day reach my child's ears and cause her misery and unhappiness, I will give up this life that I am leading, with all its attendant horrors, and, for her sake, retire into some far corner of the earth, where the past may be forgotten.

"May God bless both her and you, and comfort a father's heart, who, for his child's sake, goes out into voluntary exile, where his solitude and old age may never be cheered by the smile and sunshine of his daughter's presence."

Three months later the marriage of Basil Mayne and Joan Barr was solemnised, and the same day Adam Barr bade farewell to his daughter and sailed for southern seas.

His departure was a great grief to Joan, who, throughout the whole of her life, never learnt the mystery attending her father's career. But a week after his departure Basil Mayne chanced to pick up a newspaper, when his eye fell on a paragraph which caused him to utter an involuntary exclamation. For this is what he read—

"We understand that the post of public hangman has become vacant, the man who has hitherto occupied it having permanently left the country. His former assistant will probably succeed to the position thus made vacant."

What's in a Name?

Being the History of Another Quarrel at Laburnum Villa.

["The Romance of an Unpaid Bill," which introduced Mr. and Mrs. Sinclair to readers of "Short Stories," appeared in the issue dated February 21*st.*]

It was quite two years since the quarrel over the milliner's bill, which quarrel some of you may remember. And I am happy to relate that since then there had been no quarrel worth speaking of, but this one seemed to bid fair to rival its famous predecessor. This is how it happened:

Gerald was impatiently pacing the dining-room floor at Laburnum Villa, waiting to hear the verdict from upstairs. Presently the doctor entered, his face all wreathed in smiles.

"Is it a b-baby, doctor? No, confound it, I mean, is it a boy, doctor?" spluttered Gerald.

"It is, Mr. Sinclair, and a very fine specimen too," replied the doctor, as though he were commenting on the merits of a prize bull calf; but that is beside the question.

"Ha!" almost screamed the delighted Gerald; "a boy is it? Then I've got his name all ready. Gerald Arthur Sinclair, he will be. And how's Mrs. Sinclair, doctor?"

"First rate, couldn't be getting along better. Now here's the nurse with your son and heir."

Then Gerald displayed a large amount of lunacy. After having decided that there was something alive in all that mass of wrappings, and having been solemnly assured by the nurse that it was his own and they weren't trying to substitute some inferior infant on him, "For I've read of such things," he said, he held it in his arms, until the terrified nurse took her charge again and retreated.

Thenceforward Gerald was an authority on children, and the next day he took a father of fourteen children to lunch with him, and gravely contradicted all his views on the bringing-up of children. "From experience" was his favourite remark. Still, the man who had had experience didn't mind, he'd been like it himself, and, as Gerald was paying for his luncheon, he ate a great deal and smiled.

Soon, however, the time for christening the juvenile Sinclair drew near, and Ethel mooted the subject to her husband.

"Certainly, my dear, by all means have him christened," was that gentleman's lordly reply, as though he were granting a great favour.

"Of course we must have the sweet little dear christened you silly man, but what name shall the precious darling have?"

Hereafter I will not chronicle the endearing names Mrs. Sinclair used when speaking of her offspring. It is a peculiar thing, uncommon to most young mothers, I believe, but Mrs. Sinclair had come to the conclusion that there never was a baby like hers in the whole wide world.

"Name—er—oh yes, I've already got that—Gerald Arthur."

"Oh, you've already got it," repeated Mrs. Sinclair, somewhat nettled. "Then presumably I have nothing to say in the matter?"

"Peculiar thing if you don't; I never knew any matter before but what you had a great deal to say in."

"That's it, now be a brute to me!" cried Mrs. Sinclair, commencing to sob. But Gerald cut her short

"My dear, there's no logic whatever in your remarks; you——"

"Logic?" broke in Mrs. Sinclair; "I don't want to know anything about your old logic. Why don't you want the baby called Logic, you're always talking about it?"

"My dear, I could hardly misname a child of yours so."

"Your sarcasm is wasted on me, and now, once for all, I will not have my son called Gerald Arthur."

"Your son?" repeated Mr. Sinclair. "I'll have you know he's as much mine as yours. Now then, what's this foolishness about the kid's name?"

"How dare you call my son a kid?"

"Well, he bleated like one all last night so neither of us could sleep," responded her husband ungraciously. Which lack of sleep may perhaps account for the peculiar tempers that particular morning.

"That was the way you held him. You can't expect a child to do anything else but cry when you grasp him tightly round the middle like a—er—cricket bat." People are not in the habit of grasping a cricket bat tightly round the middle, but still, we will pass that over.

"Well, madam, I've not yet gone through a course of nursing lessons nor did they include that in my early training."

"Now you're getting ridiculous, and, once for all, I will not have my son called Gerald Arthur."

"You may have your son called what you like, but my son shall be christened Gerald Arthur Sinclair."

"Fancy how everyone would laugh. Look what his initials would be—G. A. S. Why, everyone would be calling him 'Gas.'"

"And everyone would say, 'How like his mother.'"

"Brute!" responded his wife.

And that was the last word spoken on the subject that morning, for presently the maid brought in the breakfast.

Gerald sat down to the table and helped himself to various edibles, and then got up and poured out his coffee. This being done, he commenced to eat. Then Ethel came to the table and did exactly the same thing.

For some unaccountable reason the morning paper had not arrived so that Gerald was unable to take refuge in man's natural morning retreat. So they both sat in stony silence.

Presently Gerald wanted some salt. Laboriously he got up and walked round to where it was just by Mrs. Sinclair's side. Noticing what he was wanting, Mrs. Sinclair picked up the salt and began to leisurely help herself. Gerald waited five seconds and then with a snort rushed out into the kitchen and returned with a great lump of cooking salt, and, taking up the bread knife, proceeded to shave some off on to his plate.

Then Mrs. Sinclair wished to cut some bread, and picking up the bread knife (which Gerald had used for the salt), gazed at it critically and laid it down again. Then she rang for the maid and told her to bring in a clean bread knife.

This sort of thing would have gone on all breakfast time, if it were not for the fact that both husband and wife noticed a book in the room. As it happened, it was the only book in the breakfast-room that morning. It was Nuttall's dictionary, a present to Gerald from a friend of his. A dictionary, by the way, is always such a nice friendly present to give.

Well, as I have said, husband's and wife's eyes alighted on this volume together, and in consequence they both rose together and walked to the side table where the book lay. Mrs. Sinclair seized it first, but, seeing her husband was on the same quest, she turned her nose up and released her hold and walked away to her breakfast again.

Gerald picked up the book and also sat down, and then opened it so that the title page with "Gerald N. Sinclair" written on it could be plainly seen by his wife.

He studied his name himself for some minutes and appeared to find it most diverting. He finished his breakfast with his interesting companion propped up against the bread, which gave Ethel the opportunity of ringing for a fresh loaf when she wanted some bread, which she did with the greatest apparent zest.

The air was almost blue when Gerald put on an old black cutty clay pipe, which his wife disliked more than anything. And when he walked upstairs smoking it, her rage knew no bounds. She rushed to her room, and, putting on her hat and coat, went out of the house, whilst Gerald grinned from the bathroom window as he watched her.

Mrs. Sinclair returned about lunch time; she felt she was sinking but she still kept her colours flying and her decks cleared for action. And neither spoke all lunch time. Now when they had a bad quarrel two years ago Gerald had gone to a hotel and stayed there, but he was wiser now. "No need to chuck away money on a hotel," he philosophised.

To tell the truth and shame someone or other, as the saying is, neither of them was in a temper any longer, but each still thought the other was. So that when presently an infant's howl penetrated into the dining-room Ethel rushed frantically upstairs, and Gerald's anger revived sufficiently to take him into the drawing-room and there cause him to play Chopin's Funeral March.

Suddenly there was a violent attack on the door from the other side, and it was burst open by Ethel, who came in with a rush and a scared face.

"Oh, Gerald, baby's choking! Oh, he'll die, I'm sure he will!" she cried.

Hurriedly dispatching a maid for the doctor, Gerald rushed upstairs to find that his son and heir had got the mouthpiece and guard of his feeding-bottle firmly wedged in his mouth and was going black in the face. How he had done it, Heaven and itself alone knew, but babies are marvellous creatures.

It took Gerald exactly twenty seconds to get it out, and then he returned to the dining-room whilst Ethel commenced to soothe the child.

In about a quarter of an hour's time Mrs. Sinclair entered the dining-room, and, closing the door behind her, stood still, gazing at her husband.

"Gerald," she said presently; "I'd like the boy to be called Gerald Arthur now."

She commenced this speech standing but finished it on her husband's knee.

"You'd like Gerald Arthur, would you?" replied that worthy. "Well, I've been thinking I don't care for it much now."

"Well, we must keep Gerald, at any rate."

"Yes, dear."

"And I think Austen is such a nice name for a second name. Shall we call him Gerald Austen, dear?"

"I think that sounds very well, Ethel. Yes, we'll call him that. And now, aren't you sorry you ——" But I really must break off there for the remainder of the conversation is very private.

Thus it came about that after the christening, one of Gerald the younger's uncles said to Ethel, "Queer initials you've given that nephew of mine—G. A. S., we shall have to call him 'Gas.'"

"But we altered them; we didn't call him Arthur," cried Ethel, and then she stopped as she caught her husband's eyes and heard a subdued whisper—"How like his mother."

TWO WEBS OF MEMORY.

Telling of the Awakening of a Husband.

"MILDRED!"

It was the young wife's name which was called, and the husband was sitting in the cosy drawing-room of their happy little home, reading by the soft light of the flickering gas burner, and resting his slippered feet upon the burnished brass fender in front of a glowing fire of rosy embers.

"Mildred!" he called again, as when a lover he breathed her name, the sweetest in all the world to him.

But there was no answer.

"Ah!" he murmured, "the dear girl does not hear her husband's voice," and he lay back in his easy chair and watched the blue flames dance in and out among the sparkling coals.

At such a time memory weaves cunning webs of softened colours and sweet designs, and the young husband's thoughts flew backwards and forwards in the loom of the past.

Three years ago he had been a mother's petted darling, with no wish ungratified, no comfort neglected, no luxury forgotten. Yet he felt within his heart a tender longing, an empty void, which so far in his happy life had remained unfilled. Mildred Ray came, and the mother's heart knew that the wife was greater than the mother.

A year passed, and Mildred was his wife. Gentle, loving, beautiful, he took her to their new home, and for two years she had filled his mother's place, and made his home a beautiful ideal, a four-walled paradise upon earth, yet far above it.

He was serenely happy and peacefully comfortable. Mildred had given him her thought, her energy, her time, her endeavour—and he was at rest.

He awoke from his reverie with a start.

"Mildred!" he called.

No answer.

He became alarmed. Was it, then, all a dream? And was he to be rudely awakened?

Alas, for the mutability of human affairs.

"Mildred!" he called for the fourth time.

"Yes, Henry," came the sweet-voiced answer from a sofa in the corner.

"Oh!" he said, in a tone of relief. "Are you there, darling?"

"Yes, hubbie mine."

"Well, love, the fire is going out; won't you go and fetch some more coal?"

"Not much, petsey! I've been doing the loving-wife slave business long enough, and if you want any more coal you'll have to get it yourself."

Mildred's memory had been weaving a few webs itself while that fire was slowly getting cold.

OUR SERIES.

Confessions of a Self-made Girl

The writer of these Confessions relates in this series of articles the true story of her life, from the time when she left Cornwall, an unsophisticated but ambitious girl, until she made her name and fortune. Her name is well known to you.

[For the purposes of these Confessions I am calling myself Maud Cardew, as my real name is too well known for me to wish to make the story of my life public in this manner.]

The Principals in the Story.

MAUD CARDEW.—The self-made girl.

HON. ROBERT LESTRANGE. (Commonly known as Bobbie.)

REGINALD (DI) NORTHCOTE.

Men who had helped her to come to London and befriended her on her arrival.

I Meet with an Accident.

September 11th.

So I am to be a peeress after all.

We have been engaged just two weeks now, and everyone who knows has got over the first surprise. I begged there should be no fuss made, so we were very kindly left to ourselves, and permitted to remain still a secondary topic to the birds. People have been nicer about it than I thought they would be, but possibly as a prospective duchess, they think it policy to keep in my good books. Bah! How sceptical I am growing!

Thank Heaven! St. Aubyn has scarcely any relations. I should think there never was another duke so impoverished, or I might say so blest, in that respect.

There is a married sister, who has written me quite a passable letter—an old bachelor uncle who has sent a message—and a maiden aunt, who had an epileptic fit on hearing the news, and has been ill ever since.

St. Aubyn was quite pleased about the aunt. "I have owed her a grudge ever since she boxed my ears once as a boy," he said. "Now I think I have got my own back again," which was very horrid of him, and I told him so. But he only laughed and said, "Would you have me pretend I was sorry?"

I never knew anyone so absolutely indifferent to the world's opinion as he is. Sometimes I think it is because of his colossal faith in himself, and it irritates me.

I often wonder if Di has heard yet, and Bobbie? I wonder if any of us can ever be the same again, or anything like it? And if Di will mind at all? I know Bobbie will

I shall not need a banker any more I suppose, and I have a shrewd suspicion that Bobbie, for all his boyishness, will not be allowed to lounge any longer in my drawing-room at will. For I have discovered that St. Aubyn is decidedly masterful, and I think he would be jealous.

So far I have let him have his own way pretty well; but that is partly because I am still tired, and it is so much simpler to do as you are told. Before we get married I shall have to put my foot down over something, or I shall have no will left at all.

He was not very pleased yesterday when I was telling a girl about some of Bobbie's escapades, and what a dear, delightful, foolish boy he was. He said afterwards when one opened a new chapter in one's life quite unlike the rest, it was wiser to close the last and begin again as if it had not been.

I said nothing could ever make me change to my old friends, and he bit his moustache, in a funny little way he has when not pleased, and said it would of course have to be a question of "give and take."

I don't know what he meant, unless he has some girl pal he thinks I shall want him to give up. I certainly shall not, if she is anything like Bobbie was to me. I should think he was lucky ever to have had such a pal, and ought not to lose her at any price.

He has been very honest about his affairs, and I am glad, though he must have spent an unconscionable amount of money to get through all he has, since he came of age. But there, I have always known he was not a saint, and it is better to have one's eyes open.

September 13th.

A strange thing happened last night. I sit down to write about it feeling almost as if there were nothing else at all in Heaven or earth.

St. Aubyn and I were sitting on the terrace when he suddenly said—

"Do you know, from the first time I saw you and Di Northcote together, after I returned from abroad, I thought he was in love with you."

I felt my heart give a great bound, and I caught my breath with a little gasp.

"What an odd idea," I said, as he seemed to expect me to speak. "Why I remember you telling me he was just the kind of man who would never marry."

"Very likely, but it doesn't follow he would never fall in love."

I did not speak, and he went on.

"The first night I went to see you act I sat just behind Northcote in the stalls. He was at one side, rather in a corner, and he never took his eyes off your face."

Digitized by Google

Still I did not speak. Something like a terrible fear was dragging at my heart strings.

"I saw him three separate times," he continued, "and he was always the same—he never took his eyes off your face, and afterwards he went away directly without speaking to anyone. I remember once, too, hearing a fellow at the club make a bet that if Northcote were not such a confirmed old bachelor he would be head over ears in love with you."

"Well, he was quite wrong then," I said shortly. "Mr. Northcote has never shown me the slightest attention, except over business matters, with which he was pleased to amuse himself. Besides, he is practically engaged to Lady Danestone."

"Lady Danestone!" he echoed in surprise. "Whoever put such a tale as that about? Why she is engaged to General Lumley and has been for some little time, though it may not have been public. She is a sort of connection of mine, so I know it's true. The doctors won't let her go to him in India, so they are waiting until he comes home for good next Christmas, and then they will be married."

"Then why are they always together?" I asked, half-defiantly, with an odd bursting sensation about my head.

"Oh, Northcote has been hand in glove with her family for years and years. Her brother, who was killed in Egypt, and her husband, who died from a hunting accident, were his two greatest friends. They were known at one time as 'The Inseparables.'

"No," he continued, "I think Di liked you. I once said something about you purposely before him, to see how he would take it, and he went as black as thunder, and looked furious. I'm glad I've cut him out; he such a very superior being in his own estimation."

"I think we'll go in," I said, getting up rather hurriedly. "It has turned so chilly."

And all the way along I kept saying to myself:

"What if Di did love me after all? What if Di did love me?"

That was yesterday, but I am saying it still, and I seem to have been saying it ever since.

Shall I go on saying it all my life, I wonder? Will it lie like a cold hand across my happiness for ever?

September 20th.

How long it seems since I last wrote? How hopelessly hopeless everything seems to be getting? Two days after that last entry we went to a garden party at the neighbouring castle. And Di was there.

I saw him in the distance before he saw me, and suddenly everything seemed to reel and grow indistinct, and I clutched Mrs. Mateson's arm.

"What is the matter?" she asked anxiously, and I managed to stammer:

"It is nothing. I am only a little faint. Please don't say anything about it."

"All right," she answered. "We will take a turn down here," and I think she guessed I had had a shock of some sort, for she was just kind without asking any questions.

By the time Di came to shake hands with me I was quite collected again. It was well on in the afternoon, and St. Aubyn had left me to talk "big game" with another guest.

"So my duties are nearly at an end?" he said simply, taking an empty chair beside me.

He looked ill, I thought, and though his face was still the same impenetrable mask, there was something new in his eyes. In a certain suggestion of hopelessness they showed more feeling.

"You must be very glad," I said, scanning his face half-eagerly, in spite of myself.

"Why should I?" he asked. "It was my own wish all through."

"Yes, but I think you were prompted by a sense of duty towards a country mouse at large in town."

"No," he said, thoughtfully, "I don't think I was."

Then he fell to drawing a pattern on the gravel with his stick, and for some minutes neither of us spoke.

"Have you heard from Bobbie?" he asked at last.

I answered "Yes," and smiled faintly. For Bobbie had not been pleased to approve of the match, and after describing my fiancé as "that doll faced man with the skylight," had announced his intention of shooting him at the first opportunity.

"If I don't do it for you, you will do it yourself in three months," he had written, "and I should be much more entertaining on the scaffold than you."

Di seemed to gather some of this from my silence, and presently said:

"I suppose it really means 'Good-bye' for Bobbie and me?"

"Bobbie will perhaps mind a little?" I said half bitterly.

"And why not I?" he asked.

"You!" I cried, goaded suddenly to rashness. "Of course you will not mind! Why should you? When have you minded about anything for years? Hasn't it been your studied aim to teach yourself not to mind anything? To become a sort of polished statue instead of human flesh and blood?

"Do you think I have not known that you were pleased to show an interest in me because I happened to be a little out of the common? And that all the time, in reality, you had a sort of tolerant indulgence towards me as an actress, not good enough for a friend?"

I got up and walked to a low terrace wall, and leant my arms upon it, breathing heavily. Di did not speak for a long time, but when at last he came to me, there was a yet further change in his face, though I cannot describe it.

"I think you have accused me unjustifiably," he said. "Have you ever known me make a friend of any woman?"

"What of Lady Danestone?" I asked.

He seemed surprised.

"I have known Edith Danestone all my life," he said, "and I loved her husband as few men love each other. For years after his death she was inconsolable, and I was almost the only one she could bear to speak to about him. In consequence it drew us very near together. It is quite eighteen years ago now since he died, and she is engaged to be married to General Lumley, also a friend of mine, who is out in India. I might remind you," he added, "that sometimes when I have tried to be a friend you would not let me."

"Yes, I know!" I cried. "I could not bear your condescension. I felt you were sneering at me up your sleeve, all the time you were kindly directing my steps in the way they should go. I was a kind of automaton to you—all women are—that should run upon certain lines, and whom you could occasionally treat as possessing some intellect, and worthy of a passing consideration.

"Some of my worst exploits were the result of your veiled sneering. Sometimes you made me feel I could do anything to oppose you. You seemed to think any woman would be glad of your guidance. I wanted to show you that I did not care a fig for it, whatever the consequences. That you were always right in the end, only made me more sore."

He had grown very white while I talked, but I could not leave off—wrong or right I felt I must have it out with him, and he did not attempt to stop me.

"One of the first aims I conceived in London was that of making you feel," I ran on. "I believed you had a heart somewhere, and I made up my mind to try to get at it. I know that I have failed ignominiously, but I do not think anyone else will succeed. I do not think anything can touch you very much again."

"You are wrong," he said very quietly. "Far from failing, you have signally succeeded. During the last few weeks, through you, I have discovered that I have a power to feel equalled only by a power to suffer."

In the quiet of his voice, characteristic still of his complete mastery over himself, there was a note that left no room for doubt. I dare not look at his face—all at once I was conscious of a new hopelessness in it that stirred my soul to its inmost depths. I tried to speak, but my tongue refused to frame any words. In the hour of my longed-for triumph, I felt only humiliated and crushed.

"I hope you will be very happy," he said, in that same quiet way, "and since it means the end of our—our friendship, I should like to say, only you will not have it—our intercourse I will take this opportunity of saying I shall always feel indebted to you for showing me what you have about my own heart."

In a kind of daze, I saw St. Aubyn coming towards us, and then Di walked slowly away in the opposite direction. I tried to call him, but I seemed speechless, and I felt myself gripping the stone parapet in a kind of frenzy. If he had heard and come back I verily think I should have explained everything then, before the two of them.

But he did not hear—he did not hear. He went away out of my life, and perhaps I shall never see him again, to tell him I know I have wronged him.

October 20th.

This is the first time I have held a pen for a whole month, and now I am writing on a sofa, when I believe I am supposed to be sleeping quietly. Anyhow nurse has gone for a walk, and Mrs. Mateson has just crept out of the room and closed the door.

A good deal has happened since I last wrote, but of course the chief event is the one which laid me on my back a prisoner—I cannot even yet say for how long. It resulted partly over that incident of putting my foot down about something I once spoke of, and happened in this way.

The day after the garden-party St. Aubyn wanted to go into Glasgow, so he borrowed Colonel Mateson's motor, and prevailed upon me to drive with him.

We started off very early, just our two selves and a footman, in a beautiful little Panhard, and had a delightful run into Glasgow. It was a lovely day and St. Aubyn did not want to talk much, for which I was grateful for I was still feeling somewhat dazed over Di's revelation the previous day.

When we reached Glasgow St. Aubyn did his shopping, and we went to a hotel to lunch. Afterwards we stood in the entrance a few minutes waiting for the motor, and just then a girl I used to act with, and with whom I had been very friendly, came into the hotel with two men. She saw me at once, and hesitated as if to see whether I wished to acknowledge her. I did instantly, and said to St. Aubyn: "I know that girl well, I will go and speak to her."

He hurriedly studied the trio, and his mouth immediately assumed a scornful expression.

"You mean you used to know her," he said coldly.

"Not at all," I answered with spirit. "I was rather fond of her, and must just ask her about one or two of the old friends."

"Nonsense!" he exclaimed. "You cannot possibly be seen speaking to anyone in company with two men like that."

I admit the men were terrible, but I was angry at St. Aubyn's peremptory way of putting it, and saw a good opportunity of asserting my independence.

"It is not of the least consequence to me who sees me," I said airily. "I shall not keep you long."

"I object," he said angrily. "If you go it is against my express wishes."

For answer I crossed the hall and held out my hand to Ellen Grey.

After a little desultory conversation, in which the two men proved themselves the bounders they looked, I said good-bye again, and went back to St. Aubyn.

"Are there any other third-rate, low comedians you wish to converse with?" he asked scathingly, "before we start."

"Not unless we meet Bertha Grey on the road," I answered coolly, "her sister says she is in Glasgow. But I'll thank you not to insult my friends, St. Aubyn," I added.

"Oh, ask them all out to the Nest by all means, if you like," he snarled. "I'm sure Mateson would allow them to have tea in the servants' hall."

I hated Bertha Grey as much as I liked her sister, but seeing her cross the road at that moment, I went down the steps to meet her, and doubtless, as much to her surprise as anyone's, shook hands with her affably.

Then, without a word to St. Aubyn, I took my seat in the motor. He mounted beside me with a like silence, and we started homewards. I leant back and professed to be lost in admiration of the scenery, gazing about me with an air of the utmost unconcern.

St. Aubyn bit his moustache hard and put on the speed, until we must have got to thirty or forty miles an hour. When we came to corners, he shot round them with mad recklessness and took the hills in a break-neck fashion. The only time we broke the silence, was when after rounding a particularly nasty curve, I remarked: "I am sorry I have not made my will."

He did not reply, but continued the same speed.

So we flew on until it seemed to me the motor was a live thing, to which he had transmitted in some way his ill-temper. It was as though he was working it down into the motor, which in its turn became more reckless and unmanageable.

There is no denying it was exciting, in fact thrillingly so—I found myself presently holding tightly to the seat with my whole body strung to a tremendous pitch of wild, reckless enjoyment. I do not know what St. Aubyn felt, but I could see he had an iron grip upon the steering gear, and his eyes rigidly fixed on the road.

The climax came suddenly, when we were nearly home, and was due to a side-slip. Had the road not been greasy at that particular curve, we should doubtless have reached home in safety. As it was, the motor gave a terrific skid, and was flung full tilt against a bank.

The footman cleverly jumped over the bank, but it was a positive miracle St. Aubyn and I were not killed outright. As it was I knew no more until I came round in my own bedroom, and found Mrs. Mateson bending over me.

When I was sufficiently myself to speak, I asked about St. Aubyn. They told me he had a broken arm, and was rather badly cut and bruised, but had insisted on remaining near me until he had nearly fainted, and then the doctor had carried him off to bed. After that I do not remember anything much for a week.

I had a slight concussion of the brain, and had ricked my back badly. I know St. Aubyn almost lived in the room, and that he brought me lovely bouquets every morning, but I was too ill to do more than smile faintly when he spoke to me.

I remember, whenever I could think coherently at all, I thought I was dying, and I was glad. I suppose it was then that Nelly Mateson guessed my secret. Anyhow, I feel that she knows it now though nothing has been said between us.

But I did not die in spite of my wish, and now I am nearly all right again except for my back, which will not get well. St. Aubyn is goodness itself to me—he cannot do enough. I wish it were not so.

I am breaking my heart for Di. If only I had died—no one need have been hurt then. But now that St. Aubyn is waiting on me hand and foot, and has become more than ever wrapped up in me, how am I ever to tell him that I cannot marry him? I feel as if I should hate myself forever.

And when I have told him what am I to do? I feel I shall never see Di again at all, and so it seems as if I might just as well spare St. Aubyn the blow, and do all I can to make him happy. Only how can I marry him? How can I, when all the time I am breaking my heart for someone else?

(Next week I shall conclude my confessions.)

A SPLENDID SERIES

by Winifred Graham, whose work will be best known to readers of Short Stories by her serial "When the Birds Begin to Sing," which appeared some little time ago, will start next week. It will be quite a different style from any of the series which have recently been published. Order a copy of next week's Short Stories to be reserved for you.

Complete in Twelve Lists.

BRAND NEW COMPETITION.

Cash Down. Cash Down. Cash Down.

1st Prize, £50. 2nd Prize, £25. 3rd Prize, £10.

And 25 Gramophones.

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Below will be found six paragraphs containing the buried names of Railway Stations in the United Kingdom (or words that sound the same as the names). You must write in the spaces given the names of the Railway Stations so indicated.

No word or part of a word may be used more than once in making up the name of a Railway Station. In the event of the name of a Railway Station occurring more than once in a sentence, it should be underlined and written down each time. In case of more than one person finding the same number of words for each or any sentence, those words containing the largest number of letters will have preference. No name of a Railway Station may be composed of a single letter, either standing by itself or taken from any word in the sentences.

When you have discovered the names of Railway Stations in the sentences, underline (in ink) the words which go to make up the names (or words that sound the same as the names) and then on the line underneath each sentence write (in ink) the correct names of the Railway Stations to be found in each.

All the names will be found in the Index to Railway Stations in the January edition of Bradshaw's Guide. Should you be unable to obtain a copy of this Guide, a reprint of the Index will be sent to you for three penny stamps on application to Bradshaw's Guide, 59 Fleet Street, London, E.C.; or Room Eight, SHORT STORIES, 17 and 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

The names of the Railway Stations consist of one word or two or more consecutive words, or consecutive parts of one word, or two or more consecutive words.

The first prize of £50 will be given to the Competitor who fills in the greatest number of railway stations under the conditions stated. The second prize of £25 will go to the person who fills in the next greatest number, and the other prizes will be awarded in the order of merit.

When you have filled in all the names you can find, cut out the list below and keep it by you. Don't on any account send it to us until the closing date is announced in SHORT STORIES. The ninth list of sentences will appear next week.

In the event of a tie a further list (or, if necessary, several further lists) of sentences will be submitted to the tieing competitors until one wins the first prize outright.

Love's Awakening.

The Story of an Artist's Model.

"And so, Lottie, you are looking for the last time upon 'Thoughts,' for to-morrow it goes to its new owner."

"I am glad you have sold it," said the girl, "but I shall miss it, sir; it has grown to be like a friend to me."

"Which I hope it is," said the handsome young painter, smiling; "for it is your very self, when you are deep in thought; ah, Lottie, it was an unfortunate day for Claude Leclerc, when first he saw your face in the Strand."

"Taking out papers for mother," said the girl musingly. "I remember it so well. Mr. Leclerc, I did wonder, when first you spoke, why you could want me for a model; for I had never thought that I was such as you said—beautiful."

"You had never consulted your mirror then, Lottie, or those eyes of yours are not so perfect in sight, as in beauty."

The girl smiled, a rather sad smile, but free from all vanity or self-consciousness; she was accustomed by now to hear the artist praise her beauty."

"I never had overmuch time to look at my face, true, sir," she answered, "for since father died, mother has had to work very hard in her little shop and needed all my help, but things are better of late—good-night, sir—good-bye dear 'Thoughts,' I shall not see you to-morrow."

"Not unless you come very early in the morning, which is unnecessary, for you may in your mirror see its counterpart at any time."

As he spoke Claude Leclerc threw himself into the one dilapidated armchair the studio contained, and with his chin resting on his hand, intently and thoughtfully, regarded the model and the picture.

To describe one were to describe both, so lifelike was the picture, a face of rare beauty, such as an artist loves; eyes, deeply, richly blue, with changing tinges of grey in their depths; a mouth of much sweetness; a fair, rounded chin; and hair, with sunny rays, intermixed with its brown wealth; skin of rich, creamy texture, tinged with a delicate colour, that would come and go unbidden; it was a sweet, sensitive, thoughtful face.

"I think I named my picture rightly; do you not think so, Lottie?" said the artist at length; "for the face is full of thoughts; do you know that I am sometimes curious as to the nature of those thoughts; is there not a lover somewhere in the background colouring them?"

He sometimes jested thus, that he might watch the changes in her face, and so gain ideas as to how he should next paint her.

"No, indeed!" and she laughed a merry little laugh; "no, indeed, sir—good afternoon!"

"Good afternoon, child, and you will come to-morrow—for to-morrow—" and he rose and followed her to the door—"we begin our next picture—the picture which is to bring me wealth and fame."

His voice had sunk to a murmur, so that she did not hear his last words, so she merely asked:

"And what are you going to call it—this new picture, sir?"

"I cannot tell you what the subject is to be," he said as though aroused from a reverie; "I may not name it until it is finished—but—it is still something in the thought line—only—the thoughts must be concentrated on one object or subject; but we will see. Good-night, child, good-night!"

He spoke dreamily, he was thinking of his picture, and another face that was not that of his model.

"Good-night, sir," said the girl, with a perplexed air; "I will come early to-morrow."

The sound of her footsteps had long died away ere Claude Leclerc rose, and, standing before the picture, looked at it long and critically; then he walked thoughtfully up and down the studio, pausing now and then to look at the still uncovered picture.

"She is evidently perfectly heart-whole," he spoke at last, aloud, in one of his pauses before the picture. "Ah, could I but bring that look into her face, which is now lacking, it would mean the realisation of all my hopes!

"Yes, it would be grand, that heart of hers, roused to life and transforming her face, would radiate the canvas, and—the world would be at my feet, then—Rome—Italy—and Irene."

His voice lingered—tenderly, caressingly, on the last name, as though loth to let it leave his lips; his step up and down the room quickened; then he paused and covered the picture gently and caressingly, as though it lived.

As it disappeared from his view he spoke again, and in his eyes was a light of determination and resolve.

"I will do it." The words left his lips slowly. "I will do it—the task will be easy—it will not harm her—she is very young—she will forget."

* * * * *

"Turn your head a little more this way, little one—ah, that is perfect—now the arm."

Claud Leclerc touched his model lightly as he spoke, touched her as though to rearrange her hair, her pose; but, in those light, indefinable touches, the girl felt the shadow of a caress, for of late his speaking eyes seemed to love to linger on her face, and his voice when addressing her was ever soft and low.

"You are looking too thoughtful, little one," he continued softly. "Ah, those thoughts, those thoughts—look this way for a second; yes, that is better—but I tire you?"

"No," she answered, the soft colour stealing to her cheek, "I never tire; I so love to see the picture grow."

She felt his breath on her cheek as he touched her hair, his hand lay lightly on hers, and he withdrew its touch from her fingers, slowly, lingeringly, as though reluctant to do so; he stooped closer to the canvas and his hair touched her forehead. Oh, the sweetness of it all! Her heart was waking to life.

And this waking had been going on for days now; for the artist had found his task more difficult than he had anticipated, the picture was near its completion, save for a few touches that would make or mar it, that were needed to give it life.

Never had days been so fair as this, to the never-weary model; she lived in another world—a world of perfect bliss and beauty.

Her happiness was apparent in her face; she daily grew more beautiful; for every morning was the beginning of a new day of happiness, so that upon waking she would sometimes cry out, "I am glad, so glad that it is morning, and I shall see his face again."

For her heart, slow to love, but tenacious in its affections, was turning slowly but surely to the artist; she felt that he loved her; and, like an opening bud, the petals of her soul were expanding, showing forth in her face new beauties, such as one sees in the opening rose.

She had always had a strong liking for him; he was handsome and polished, and the first of his class with whom she had come into contact.

Moreover, he had ever treated her with courtesy, yet none of these things, although winning her regard and liking, would of themselves have won her love; for hers was not a nature to give its love unsought.

Besides, she had too modest an opinion of herself, and too much good sense, not usually found in people of her station, to mistake superficial flattery and attention for love.

But of late the thought would recur, although she had put it away again and again; the belief that the artist loved her; his every look and action showed it so plainly, and love for him was overwhelming her with a force that Claud Leclerc could never have realised, for, had he been able to comprehend how love could sound the depths and change the current of life, in a heart like Lottie's, he would have paused, aye, and paused long ere tampering with such a nature.

"I seem to have done but little to-day, Lottie," he exclaimed, after he had arranged her to his liking, "I cannot get the expression——"

"Oh, I wish, I do wish, I could look just as you would have me," she answered earnestly; "yet to me the picture is now beautiful enough."

"Ah, Lottie mia," he said tenderly, "were your wishes my charioteers, I know that ere this I should have reached the goal of fortune."

As he spoke their eyes met and the girl's fell before the look in those of the artist; she felt the warm flush steal over her face and neck, then it receded, leaving her pale and trembling.

She would not meet his eyes again, she dared not, he saw, and impatiently threw down his brush.

"My hand fails me somehow, these last days," he said, throwing himself into a chair and drawing her to him. "Come, let us talk instead of what I shall do should this picture bring me wealth.

"I shall go to Rome and Italy; I shall see and study the works of the great masters, and on my return we shall take what the gods have sent us—happiness—love and joy."

His voice became low and dreamy, his eyes shone as he pictured in his mind a face; a face as fair as Lottie's, aye, more regally, royally beautiful—the one face in the world for him.

The dream passed and his eyes dwelt once again on the still unfinished picture.

"Lottie, my beautiful Lottie!" He bent forward and sought her eyes; "shall we not be happy—say, little girl, for I love you, Claud loves you."

She trembled with joy and fear, the rose she held in her hand fell to the ground. Claud leant forward to regain it, then, drawing her gently to his side, he placed it in the bodice of her gown; then he drew her closer into the fold of his arms.

Raising her face to his with a tender smile, he looked into it until he had compelled her sweet, shy eyes to meet his.

She had thought to veil her heart beneath those long lashes; for the eyes beneath told him all; in them he saw the look he waited for—love, shy wonder, rapture and ecstasy—the girl's heart was awake to life and love.

With trembling haste Claud Leclerc rose, seized his brush, and touched the picture swiftly and lightly; all was forgotten—love, ambition, even the little model at whom he glanced occasionally with the eye of an artist—all but those last touches.

At length he paused, threw down his brush—triumph, elation, and other feelings, at war in his face, for the picture was finished.

* * * * * *

Three months had passed away, and whilst all London was talking of the picture of the season, a girl's heart was silently breaking with longing and waiting, and waiting in vain.

Lottie had not seen the artist since the eventful day of the picture's completion; she would not seek him at his studio, for he had said he would write or see her ere he went to Rome.

Besides this, a shyness had come to her, and a feeling of pride; he had told her of his love, then, she argued, it was he who should seek her out; for love changed the old relationship of master and model.

But days became weeks and weeks months, and he came not; surely he would not go away without one good-bye.

Ah, no! she tried to banish such traitorous thoughts; he would be busy and occupied with the exhibiting of his picture, but one day he would come and she would meet him as her lover.

Raising her face to his with a tender smile he looked into it.

But as time went on, hope became doubt, and doubt deepened into a grim certainty; and the heart of the girl grew sadder and heavier as the empty days passed, until upon it settled an oppressive weight that would not remove.

"He has gone," she would whisper sadly to the now faded brown rose, her one treasure; "he has forgotten me so soon, can he have loved me as he said and have left me like this?"

Then bitter tears would fall on the rose, tears that would almost have awakened the heart of any dead thing, and then she would brush them away and call herself silly and foolish for her mistrust of him, and, kissing the brown petals of the dead rose, she would try to smile again.

One keen, cold day in December she arose, and the load that oppressed her seemed heavier than usual; and suddenly a sore longing came upon her to see the picture once more. Claud had once said it would be hung at the Royal Academy; she would find it, wherever it was.

She gained her mother's permission who, poor soul, was sorely at a loss to know what had so changed her of late, and, drawing her thin black cape around her frail form, Lottie set off to the Academy.

Her heart throbbed with tumultuous feeling, as she peered into every room, then she saw it—saw it in the distance in a prominent place.

It seemed to her that most of the people who were there that day stood around it; and as she took a place in the background she caught faint words of approval and praise of its beauty.

How beautiful it was, and how much joy and sorrow it had caused her; she stood long before it as if spell-bound, hearing as in a dream the remarks of the passers-by.

She could almost smell the perfume of the rose as he had placed it in her bosom, she could feel his kiss on her cheek, and see his handsome, impassioned eyes looking into hers.

Some turned to look at the slight, attenuated form, but they did not recognise her as the original of the picture, for the bloom had left the cheek, now so drawn and thin.

She wondered how she could ever have looked so radiantly beautiful as the picture portrayed her; that her eyes could ever have looked so glad, her breast with its weight of heavy hopelessness could scarce believe.

These and more were her thoughts, interrupted by a voice which floated to her ears—she would have heard it even had she slept, so familiar it was; yea, and so dear.

"True, it is a charming face, Irene"—the voice softened at that name—"but it is a beauty that will soon take to itself wings, for she will marry, which among her class means work, care, drudgery——"

She heard no more, but that sufficed—that and the airy lightness of the tone; her heart became a stone.

She turned and saw him; upon his arm leant a lady of matchless beauty. Lottie saw the proud pose of the neck and head, she saw also the look, fond and worshipping, with which Claud Leclerc regarded his companion.

"Why, Lottie, you here!" he said, quickly recovering from his momentary confusion.

Something took possession and gripped her heart, something that impelled her to touch Leclerc's arm; he turned, and met a face flushed as with hectic, and eyes wildly bright.

"Why, Lottie, you here!" he said, recovering quickly from his momentary confusion and turning with his old charm of manner to his companion. "Lady Irene, Lottie, my little model; but you will know her well by now from my pictures."

"But surely"—the lady's voice was low and sweet—"surely she is changed, Claud? How thin, how ill——"

"Yes," he interrupted carelessly, "I believe she is thinner; gone off too!"

Lady Irene had been holding out her hand, but Lottie did not take it—she was powerless; she saw the sweet smile, the gold bronze of the hair, the violet eyes; she to be compared with this grace and beauty!

"I thought you had gone away, sir," Lottie managed to say at last, and her voice sounded husky and strange, even in her own ears. "As you did not write as you promised I——"

"No, I have had a very busy time," he answered, breaking in quickly ere she had finished speaking; "fame brings plenty of work and worry in its train. I go next week."

"And so he came to look once again ere his departure on 'Love's Awakening,' which would never have had an existence but for you, Lottie; but have you not been ill of late—you are much thinner than in the picture?"

Digitized by Google

It was Lady Irene who spoke ; her voice, low rich and full of sweet sympathy fell on Lottie's ears unheeded.

"Love's Awakening!" a sudden pain shot to her breast ; she put her hand there and turned dazed, unseeing eyes to the artist's face.

"Is that—is that its name?" she faltered.

He looked at her keenly, feeling slightly uneasy, a feeling strange to him. Did she guess—was it a challenge that shone in her fine eyes? Well, she must be disillusioned sometime, better at once ; but Irene must not know.

He held out his hand as these thoughts flashed through his mind, and his voice deliberately assumed a tone of regard.

"Lottie, in my absence, you must take care of yourself," he said gently, "for on my return I shall need you again, but now—good-bye, we are late."

"And whilst Claud is away may I come and see you?" said the lady kindly ; "for when he returns, we are to be married in early Spring——"

The happy laugh on her lips was stayed, changing to sudden sadness, for the girl's lips moved ; and when she found her voice it was a voice as of one in pain and anguish.

"No, you must never see me again ; you must not come," her tone was low and intense, "for I cannot bear it—I cannot!"

Her voice broke suddenly, she drew a handkerchief weakly from her breast and held it to her lips—it was stained with crimson ; then she threw up her arms and would have fallen, but Lady Irene caught her and held her close to her breast, saying quickly and decisively :

"Claud, a doctor, and my carriage, quick—I will take her home."

"Yes, home," Lottie whispered, "home ; I am so tired—so tired!"

The perfume of Lady Irene's roses stole over her senses, she saw the kind, angel-eyes filled with pity and love shining above her ; to her desolate heart they gave comfort and a sense of security, and then she seemed to fall asleep.

But once or twice her lips moved tremulously, and, Lady Irene, stooping forward eagerly, heard the whispered words : "Love's awakening!" "Love's awakening!"

* * * * *

It was a glorious February day, a day that gave promise of a glorious Springtime. Claud Leclerc was seated at breakfast in a luxuriously furnished room in a pretty Roman villa.

The hour was late, but he had only just risen ; several unopened letters were before him ; he chose one that caused him to tremble with impatience as he broke the seal.

"At last!" he said aloud. "Irene, my darling, how I have longed and waited for this! Surely she has not been ill."

His eyes scanned it eagerly, the well-loved writing ; then his face paled, his lips trembled, and he fell forward, covering his eyes with his hands—fell forward with a heavy groan. For this is what he read :

"I have just returned from laying flowers—pure and sweet as herself—on the dead form of Lottie—Lottie, an artist's model.

"You broke a true heart that you might win wealth and fame ; these are things which may be bought with the price of blood, but not so the love of Irene Vercourt. I pray God that I may never look upon your face again!"

Besy.

"Did she thank you for the seat?" "No ; but after she had settled down in it she smiled sweetly, and begged me not to rise."

"Here, what does this mean?" shouted Whooply, as he found his youngest riding a broomstick over the top of the piano. "It's all right. Mamma said if I'd stay in I could play on the piano."

"Darling," said she, "do you love me as much as ever?" "Yes, dearie," said he, with his nose buried in his newspaper. That ought to have satisfied her, but she had to ask : "Why?" "Oh, I dunno. Habit, I s'pose."

On page 623 appears the eighth list of sentences in connection with the Competition, which will be complete in twelve lists. Below are some fresh points raised by readers, together with my replies to them.

Question : May the letters in any of the words be transposed so as to form the name of a station?

Answer : It is distinctly stated in the conditions of the competition that the words or parts of words must be taken consecutively, in order to form the names.

Question : May I make the name "Heath" out of the last four letters in the word "beneath" should that word occur in any of the sentences?

Answer : Certainly not. The four letters you mention form only "Eath," there is no "H" with which to commence "Heath."

Question : May I copy the sentences out on to a piece of foolscap paper and then write the names of the stations underneath each sentence on the foolscap, instead of in Short Stories? When sending in my complete list of sentences I would, of course, inclose the pages from Short Stories.

Answer : All names of stations must be written legibly on the line given for that purpose under each sentence in Short Stories.

Back numbers containing the first seven lists can be obtained through your newsagent, or, if stamps for tenpence are sent to the Publisher, Short Stories, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, W.C., they will be sent direct, post free.

Next week will see the conclusion of the "Confessions of a Self-made Girl." In that number a series by Miss Winifred Graham will commence. This series will consist of stories told by friends to each other during journeys in the train on different occasions. Each story will be complete in itself.

In Short Stories dated May 30th, on sale the week after next, will appear the opening chapters of a new serial, the plot of which is an entirely novel one, and it will be worked out in a way quite fresh to readers of Short Stories. This story will be written by Blanche Eardley, the clever writer who is at present relating her life history in Pearson's Weekly in a series of articles entitled "Tinsel Triumphs." You should tell your friends of both this series and the new serial to start the week after next, they cannot fail to be interested.

I am glad to be able to announce that the Fresh Air Fund is beginning to swell in a most satisfactory manner, and if it continues in the way in which it has started it cannot but have a successful season. Just because it has started so well without your help, don't think that there is no need for you to send along a donation. It is needed just as much as ever, for the more money we receive, the greater the number of children who will be able to have a day's outing.

It is really astonishing the number of children there are in our big cities—a very large sum of money would be required to enable them all to go away just for one day.

If, however, each person who saw the notices regarding the Fresh Air Fund were to send only ninepence, it would mean a big increase in the number of happy little ones. Send your contribution, and ask your friends to send something as well—the sooner the better—to the Hon. Secretary, Fresh Air Fund, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. Collecting forms can be had on application. All amounts received will be acknowledged in Pearson's Weekly.

The Interference of Selina Smith.

Telling of a Postcard and a Jealous Wife.

MILLY CORTON was not in the habit of opening her husband's letters, but that custom of privacy was naturally inapplicable to postcards. They had only been married five months, and were still on the heights of romance, when the midday post brought an innocent-looking card.

Milly took it herself from the postman, giving him in return a cheery good-morning. "George Corton, Esq.," and the address were inscribed on the front. She turned it over. This was what her amazed eyes read on the back :

"98 Lonsdale Road,
"Plynton.

"DEAR GEORGE,—When are you coming to see me? I got to this place last week, and hope to be found here for a good while. Do walk round one evening and take me out! I know we shall have a happy time together, and I could probably tell you a few things that you aren't aware of.—Yours ever,
"SELINA SMITH."

For the moment Milly was literally stunned. She sat down in a dazed condition on the hall-chair. A thunderbolt had fallen from the blue ; the sky was suddenly black with clouds.

Who was this Selina Smith who dared to write to her husband in such a familiar strain ? What dreadful secret in his past life had come by chance to-day into her possession ? Five months of undimmed happiness, and now a terrible mystery that put an end to everything !

Milly read the card over and over again, till every word was photographed on her mind. It seemed to have been dashed off in a hurry, but the handwriting was not uneducated. Milly was sure that she had never seen it before.

Presently she arrived at the one possible solution of the affair. Some old, unknown admirer of George's had come to reside in Plynton, and wanted to meet him on the same footing as in his pre-nuptial days. How awful to think that such a wicked creature could even exist !

Whatever George had been before marriage—and such a very good-looking man could not help being a bit of a flirt perhaps—he was goodness personified now, never looking twice at any woman except his wife. This Selina Smith—whoever she might be—must be sent about her business.

Although profoundly assured of George's rectitude, Milly felt very miserable—so much so that after lunch she indulged in a good cry.

Her feelings thus relieved, she began to think out the plan of operations. No general tackling an unknown enemy in an unknown country could have given the matter graver consideration.

Should she let the postcard fall into George's hands or not ?

She decided that she would, and in this wise. He always went to the letter-box for the early morning delivery. The last thing to-night she would slip that fatal postcard inside, so that he might take it out with the other letters in the morning.

Thus no suspicion could occur to him that she had sighted the incriminating document. It was her unpleasant but clear duty to put her husband to the test, convinced though she was that he would emerge therefrom with flying colours.

When Milly came down next morning he first glance was towards the breakfast-table, at which George was seated eating his porridge, the newspaper erected in front of him.

There appeared to be no letters at all, and the post-card was conspicuous by its absence. George must have pocketed it. She watched from behind the tea-pot for a sign of guilt, but his appetite was as good as ever.

"I say, Milly, you look rather pale this morning."

"I didn't sleep very well."

"Something disagreed with you perhaps ? "

She nodded. Something had disagreed and was likely to disagree, until the mystery was cleared up.

As she handed him his carefully brushed hat, he remarked :

"I shall be home a little later to-night, Milly."

A dread fear clutched her heart and showed in her face.

"Don't look so woebegone about it, dear ! Only a very little later than usual ! "

She affected playfulness, though goodness knew her spirits were despondent enough.

"Oh, George ! Going off on a little spree that you won't tell your wifey about ? "

"No ! Don't be too curious ! You'll know some time."

"Won't you tell me now ? In what direction is it, I wonder ? "

"Well, I'll tell you this. I've a call to make in the Lonsdale Road. There, don't ask me anything else. Good-bye, dear ! " And he kissed her and was gone.

It was true then—terribly true. Milly staggered back into the dining-room. That adventuress had cast her spell about him ; he was going off to the address named on the post-card. Yes, the husband she once trusted had proved himself to be an arch-deceiver.

In a very short time Milly came to a decision. Her first act was to consult a Plynton directory. Feverishly she turned over the pages to ascertain who lived at 98 Lonsdale Road. Numbers 98 to 106 were occupied by Wheeler's, the biggest emporium in the town, employing over a hundred assistants. Selina Smith must be a shop-girl !

At this discovery Milly's tears broke out afresh. A person of high degree would not have mattered so much, but that a common shop girl should have had the effrontery to approach her own darling George—oh, the infamy of the thing was increased tenfold !

Half-an-hour after luncheon Milly went upstairs and put on her things—her best things. She intended to seek out Selina Smith at Wheeler's, and make an impression upon that young person which she would not speedily forget. Instant dismissal, if not something worse, would be her punishment.

All the principal shops in Plynton were situated in the Lonsdale Road. At the further end stood Wheeler's. It was an establishment that provided one with nearly everything from patent baby foods to coffins.

You could match any shade of wool there, and you could buy the best Stilton cheese in the town.

Not only could Wheeler furnish your house from attic to cellar, but he could clothe your body from head to foot, whilst an excellent circulating library catered for the good of your mind. "Put yourself in Wheeler's hands" was a favourite maxim of Plynton's inhabitants.

For a few minutes Milly hung about the windows. She was not, however, peering at bonnets or studying shades of cretonnes, though she appeared to be. In reality she was rehearsing her part and mastering her nerves. Presently with some trepidation she went in.

An obsequious shop-walker glided forward.

"What can I show you, madam?"

"Er—nothing just at present, thanks! I wanted to see—— Have you a Miss Smith here?"

"Smith! Yes! In the silk department. You want to speak to her?"

"If you please!"

"Step this way."

Milly followed him upstairs and along a corridor, her courage oozing away with every step. Should she make some trivial purchase and withdraw? But duty was paramount. The man stopped at a counter.

"Miss Smith, forward!"

No one appeared. He called again. With a "Yes, sir!" a girl came running up.

"This lady wants to see you, Miss Smith," and the shop-walker withdrew—to a discreet distance.

Taking stock of the young person who had sought to impress her husband by her fascinations, Milly experienced a considerable shock. Where—oh, where—was George's taste? A raw, large-boned, country miss in an ill-fitting black dress, and without one decent feature in her face.

George had always said that good looks in a woman were a necessity (Milly knew that she herself had strong claims to prettiness.) In what could possibly consist the attractiveness of the girl before her?

Milly gradually awoke to the fact that she was expected to speak, but her rising anger made it difficult.

"What can I get you, madam?"

"Nothing, thanks. You are Miss Smith?"

"Yes."

"I wanted a word with you privately. Oh, how could you do such a thing?"

Miss Smith opened her eyes. Had she palmed off some indifferent material at the recent sale to this now better-informed customer?"

"I'm afraid, madam, I don't understand."

"You soon will, then. You know my husband, Miss Smith?"

"If you would kindly tell me what your name is I might answer your question."

"My name is—Corton."

"Corton! I don't know anyone of that name."

This apparent innocence was disgraceful. Milly felt herself swept away by a tide of moral indignation.

"Oh, you wicked girl! You are now adding lying to your other sins. But you'd better throw up the sponge. I know all about it."

The girl's mouth—and such a plain one too—was wide open with astonishment.

"You've been writing to my husband," continued Milly, "and asking him to take you out. Where did you meet him first I want to know? Why have you come to Plynton to break up our happy home? What are the horrible lies you want to tell him about me? You're a bad woman. I shall get Mr. Wheeler to send you away."

Miss Smith's cheeks were red with surprise, indignation, fear. This woman must be mad. A lunatic asylum was situated on the confines of Plynton, and evidently one of its inmates had escaped.

Fixing her eyes on Milly—Miss Smith knew by tradition that this was the wisest course to adopt with mad people—she called loudly: "Mr. Wood! Mr. Wood!"

The shopwalker appeared. His first glance at the two faces told him that a storm was raging, but he always had a plentiful supply of oil to pour on troubled waters.

"Perhaps you will explain to this gentleman, madam," said Miss Smith, signalling something to the shopwalker which he could not understand.

Milly repeated her charge as coherently as her temper would allow. The man looked her through and through. He too had doubts of this lady's sanity.

"There must be some mistake, madam. The morals of the young ladies we employ are quite above——"

"But I tell you she has written to my husband. I've seen the card."

"Signed, madam?"

"Certainly! Selina Smith, as bold as brass!"

"My name is Violet, and it's my only one," observed Miss Smith.

"Did you say Selina Smith, madam?" inquired the shop-walker.

"I did. Isn't this she?"

Mr. Wood's next action was so unworthy of the honourable position that he held that one hardly likes to mention it. He smiled so broadly that the smile could not be hidden by the big pocket-handkerchief of which he hurriedly made use. He took it away to speak, but exploded again.

Milly—the picture of virtuous wrath—looked from one to the other.

"I asked you a question, sir."

"Pardon me. It is so funny. There's no such person as Selina Smith."

"No such person?"

"Not outside the pages of a book." He searched among some papers in his pocket. "Doubtless your husband had a postcard exactly like that, madam?"

He was holding out an exact duplicate of the card that George had received. Milly nodded.

"It's a publisher's clever but rather unscrupulous dodge to advertise a new novel called 'The Interference of Selina Smith.' These postcards have been sent, I find, to a good many people in Plynton, but, needless to say, without our co-operation. Perhaps you didn't observe that yours was lithographed?"

"I didn't. It was stupid of me." Milly turned to the girl. "I ask your pardon, Miss Smith."

"Oh, it's granted."

The shopwalker's dignity had returned.

"If you'll step downstairs, madam, to the book department I'll show you a copy of the novel. You might like to buy it as a curiosity."

* * * * *

George Corton arrived home only twenty minutes later than usual that evening.

"There, Milly, that's the reason I'm late."

She opened eagerly the small case which he thrust into her hand.

"A silver manicure set—the very thing I wanted! Oh, George, how good of you!"

"Not at all! I just thought it might look better on your dressing-table than in Wheeler's window."

Milly could not suppress a smile. So he had been there after all.

"I was in their shop this afternoon and bought a book for you, George. Do you know it at all? It's called 'The Interference of Selina Smith.'"

"That's the humorous novel the publishers are trying to advertise by a new dodge. I got a postcard about it this morning. Didn't I show it you?"

"No, George!"

He produced the card. She read it through, and turned it over, as though it were something fresh to her.

"Imagine," he said, "a jealous wife waylaying a document like that! I thought of trying you by way of a joke, Milly, but I knew it wouldn't work. You are far too sensible."

"Perhaps I'm not all you think me, George."

"Nonsense! You trust me too completely ever to have feelings of jealousy, don't you, dear?"

And Milly, the hypocrite, could only turn up her face for a kiss

TWENTY-SIXTH CHAPTER.

"That Name was Moira."

MOIRA bent her gaze upon the distant barque. To her experienced eye—the eye of one accustomed to the sea and shipping from childhood—the nearness of the vessel's departure was apparent. Laden to her shapely water-line, all taut and well-found alow and aloft, a crack modern vessel on the eve of departure is like a pretty woman lingering before her glass while her maid stands ready to open the door. Her delay may seem long, but it is almost to be counted by seconds, and then she has stepped forth out of her chamber, her toilet a thing of the past.

Although Moira did not stop to make so poetical a comparison, she felt to the full the importance of the little while that remained before the barque should weigh anchor and carry off among her crew—perhaps to death in some far quarter of the globe—the man who, according to Dennis Hartigan, knew the secret of her birth and identity.

The ex-steward studied his companion acutely. Then he shielded his eyes with his hollowed palm

"They're manning the capstan," he said; "no, only fitting the bars. But she'll be off inside the half-hour."

Moira glanced back into the house—the skilful stimulus he had given to her anxiety decided her.

"I—I must speak to nurse about going out," she answered, "and put on my hat. I won't be a minute." And, a strange excitement blotting out her instinctive dislike of the ex-steward, all remembrance of the questions that, but an instant earlier, had been springing to her lips, she darted upstairs with feverish speed.

Dennis Hartigan looked after her and his face set in a sinister mask. He opened his blue serge jacket and dived into an inner pocket, to produce a small flask of spirits, and put it to his mouth.

The fluid was neat, yet he gulped half of the bottle's contents. He had scarcely returned it to his pocket when Moira came downstairs, cloaked and hatted.

The ex-steward went before her to the garden gate, drew it wide, and they passed out together.

"We can borrow a boat from any of these landings," he said, and strode across the quay, to descend to the level of the water.

Slipping the painter of a light gig, he sprang in and took the oars. Moira sat down in the stern-sheets and adjusted the rudder-lines over her shoulders.

"I expect the skipper will be a bit puzzled," remarked the ex-steward, "but we can put him off somehow. And if a sovereign or two should be necessary to grease our man's tongue, well, I'm not so hard up that I can't manage it."

"Thank you," said Moira, as they shot out of the harbour; "it is very kind of you to take so much trouble. I'm sure I don't——"

Dennis Hartigan laughed.

"Don't know why I should," he completed; "well, I'm not certain myself. But I owe John Davenal a good turn and it seems he's been bothering himself about you having no real relations. I expect he's been set thinking about it by the narrow escape he's had of leaving you alone in the world."

"I'm—I'm not sure that I want any relations," answered Moira, bringing the gig deftly round the breakwater as Dennis Hartigan swept it forward with long strokes, "but

I should like to know who I am, and what my real name is."

"Quite so," retorted the ex-steward; "so would any girl of spirit. Well, we'll do our best to get a pointer on the subject now."

He rowed fast and skilfully and the gig breasted the slight swell that met them as she cleared the shelter of the harbour. The afternoon was fading into a prematurely early twilight, the day had been heavy and clouded, a purple haze hung about the water, veiling the horizon irregularly.

"Hadn't we better keep to starboard?" asked Moira suggestively. She had been watching the motions of the ex-steward's oars, the right one was being pulled with much more vigour than the other; the gig was swerving even against the impulse of the rudder.

"The tide's running out," said Dennis Hartigan, "I want to come in on her lee."

"Y-yes," replied Moira nervously, "but there's a nasty current down the middle of the bay—the reefs do it—and we always keep wide of it."

"Nonsense!" rejoined the ex-steward; "I'm not afraid of a bit of current." And he rowed steadily on.

The light was failing and there was a sticky ripple on the water that portended storm, as did the occasional heavier swell that stole now and again under the keel of the gig, one minute lifting her nose at a startling angle, the next flinging up her heel on the crest of a glassy roller.

The ex-steward was a clever and a powerful oarsman, and he took the gig out on the course he had chosen for himself—a huge, semi-circular sweep.

Moira knitted her brows and tried to see by the position of familiar landmarks their exact proximity to the current of which she had spoken. But the purple ocean mist flung eddying swirls of vapour over them and she could not be sure.

As for Dennis Hartigan, he was still rowing with much apparent energy, but a shrewd observer might have seen that he was putting considerably less leg-work into his strokes. The gig was making a larger offing than was necessary to fetch the seaward side of the barque.

Suddenly Moira caught a glimpse of the shore and uttered an exclamation.

"We're in the current," she said; "the port oar, Mr. Hartigan, pull the port oar. Not too hard; we must get out of the current slowly or it will upset us."

For answer the ex-steward leant on his oars and looked at her. There was a fierce glimmer in his pupils and his ashen-fair moustache had bristled.

"That won't matter," he said, "I can swim back, if I'm not picked up."

Moira paled.

"What do you mean?" she faltered; "we are not in any very great danger. We shall get out of it; I have been caught before. Let me take the oars, Mr. Hartigan, I am more used to the bay than you are."

"Sit still!" Dennis Hartigan bade her harshly, and he dropped his oar-blades into the water again. Bracing his feet on the next thwart, he gave, not the stroke she had directed, but a true swivelling stroke, one oar hard-pulled and the other backed. The boat came round broadside on, a wave lapped into her and she rocked heavily.

Dennis Hartigan let an oar slip, as the veriest tyro might have done, and grabbed at it, with assumed eagerness, throwing his body out over the gunwale. The gig tilted, filled, and sank.

Moira, abruptly immersed in the cold waves, turned instinctively upon her back, and loosed the fastening that held her cloak about her neck. The garment fell from her and she changed her position to tread water, rising with the rollers to scan the surface for the ex-steward.

Perfectly at home in the water herself, her first thought was for her companion's safety. His obstinate clumsiness had produced the accident, yet considerations of humanity outweighed all else. Besides, was it not to do her a service that he had come out in the gig?

SEIGEL'S SYRUP

Lack of food causes half our ailments and dangerous diseases. Not that we do not eat when we are hungry, or do not get enough to eat, but we do not digest what we do eat, that is the trouble. We call this indigestion, it is, in fact, "starvation," for starving means lack of food, and food is not food until it is digested. Undigested food passes through the body without doing any good, or worse, it remains and sets up fermentation in the stomach, poisoning the blood and nerves, dulling the brain, and clogging all the vital organs of the body with the vile products of indigestion.

FOR DYSPEPTICS

Thorough digestion is essential to sound health. Mother Seigel's Syrup ensures digestion. It contains digestive ferments and root and herb extracts that give tone and vitality to the stomach, liver and kidneys, enabling them to perform their functions perfectly, that is the secret of its great success. It builds health on good digestion, gives you the power to gain strength from food—the only way it can be gained.

AFTER DINNER.

"About three years ago," writes Mrs. S. A. Richards, Brynhaf Villa, Mountain Ash, Glam., "I began to suffer from sick headaches and depression. I lost my appetite completely; was frequently attacked by giddiness followed by vomiting; could get no sleep, and became too weak to walk. My stomach was unable to retain nourishment.

SEIGEL'S SYRUP

Doctors all failed in their treatment of me and I sank into a state of helplessness. But about eighteen months ago a friend advised me to try Mother Seigel's Syrup, and to my intense surprise, it acted on my system like a charm. Before I had finished the second bottle my recovery was complete." Mother Seigel's Syrup cures where everything else fails, because it acts on nature's rule that food is the origin of health and strength.

SERIAL STORY.

Without warning she felt a clasp of iron about her waist. It girdled her from behind—over her arms. She guessed that the author of the grasp was the ex-steward, and deemed that, being overtaken by a spasm of terror, he had clutched at her, as a drowning man would do.

Had he clasped her from the front she could have dealt with him and with what she took to be that desperate frenzy which so often drowns the victim and the would-be rescuer. But the vice-like clutch behind was dragging her down, down, down. She threw herself on her back and swam backwards with desperate strokes, forcing him under the water.

Dennis Hartigan's grasp shifted and one hand moved to her throat. She twisted her head quickly and the hand dropped on her lips. She parted her white teeth and fixed them in the other's flesh—one must not hesitate over expedients when not a single life but a couple are at stake.

With a bubbling oath Dennis Hartigan loosed his clasp and she forced herself round. An instant more and they were face to face in the water. Her red-gold hair had broken from its pins and streamed wetly over her shoulders and in her blue eyes, making her look like some startled mermaiden.

The ex-steward spat the salt water out of his mouth and shook the brine from his coarse locks. Moira thrilled with horror. The visage of the ex-steward was alight, not with madness, but with hate and fury.

"You jade!" he snarled; "I'll do for you this time!"

He flung himself towards her, but she struck out powerfully in the long, racing side-stroke and put half-a-dozen lengths between them. He followed her with so swift an alternate right and left stroke that he seemed to be leaping after her.

She did not wait for the attack that she perceived was imminent, but dived, mermaid-like, on the instant. He could scarcely have told where she had been.

Treading water, he tried to peer over the tops of the waves. But in vain did he strive to pierce the mists of the brooding afternoon; Moira had disappeared from his sight. He could not see that, far off, a wet, golden head had emerged, to be borne steadily seaward in the relentless grip of the current.

TWENTY-SEVENTH CHAPTER.

"The Clue Must Be Followed Up."

"Mr. Ussher anywhere about?"

Paul Jerome put the question at a dingy counter in a large, bare room whose rough paint and distempered plaster were those of the severely sanitary public office. A young constable, unhelmeted and in a short jacket, came towards him with a stern air.

"Whom did you wish to see, sir," he asked, "and on what business?"

The war-correspondent regarded his inquisitor with tolerant amusement—he was used to the ways of police functionaries, high and low. He put a card on the counter; there was a half-crown on the strip of pasteboard.

"Oh, that's all right," he said cheerfully; "Ussher and I are old friends. If he's in the building have him hunted up for me, there's a good fellow."

The constable picked up the card, the half-crown disappearing mysteriously as part of the same process.

"Certainly, sir," he said, unbending, and went out into the adjacent corridor to dispatch a subordinate upon the desired mission. "I'll let you know in a moment, sir," he added, returning.

Paul Jerome nodded his thanks and strolled up and down in the confined space between the counter and the partition that divided it from the neighbouring corridor.. The stormy light of the cloudy afternoon gleamed lividly in at the big windows of the place, accentuating its stiff, harsh formality. The young constable had gone back to his work, and his pen squeaked loudly in the silent office.

The war-correspondent had not long to wait—the person for whom he had inquired emerged from a suddenly opened door in the passage hard by. He stepped across to Paul Jerome, raising his hand and inclining his head in a compromise between a bow and a salute.

"Good afternoon, sir," he said, and paused, expectant yet non-committal.

The war-correspondent drew a folded sheet of paper from his pocket and trifled with it.

"My dear Ussher," he observed, "I am, as I think you know, a well-wisher of yours. As a professional crime-investigator, I was, necessarily, at times, a critic of you and your work. That painful necessity exists no more and I can afford to be disinterested."

The detective coughed gruffly.

"I'm afraid, sir," he rejoined, "I must ask you to be more precise." But his eyes wandered to the document in his visitor's fingers.

"I propose, Ussher," he was told imperturbably, "to make you a present of some valuable information. In acknowledgment of which you will gratify my curiosity upon a point concerning which you will be no less curious than myself."

"Indeed," began the detective, but he glanced at the war-correspondent, and the supercilious, patronising note died out of his tone.

"I am very much obliged to you, Mr. Jerome," he said, with an effort, "a hint from you, sir, is not to be despised. As for anything I can tell you—legitimately, sir—you are very welcome."

Paul Jerome gave him the paper. It was that upon which the war-correspondent had taken the impress of the finger-prints from the cupboard door on the top storey of the Tower—the paper to which he had attached, for purposes of comparison, a certain newspaper illustration.

Mr. Ussher studied them.

"This—this ought to be very important, sir," he commenced. "I'm not an expert on such things myself, but the prints are near, very near alike, if not the same. May I ask who——"

He interrupted his sentence to step out into the corridor; the expression in his bilious eyes took the war-correspondent with him. Mr. Ussher piloted his companion into a small ante-room and shut the door. Then he contemplated once more the parallel prints.

"You got these yourself, sir," he said questioningly, as if by way of repeating, less bluntly, his incompleted query.

Paul Jerome shook his head.

"Not directly from a human hand," he responded, "they are from the inside of a painted door-frame on the same floor of the Tower as that on which Hannah Davenal was found dead. The door is that of a disused and dusty cupboard, there are partially-dusted-over finger-marks on the shelves and the door has apparently been drawn to by soiled fingers."

Mr. Ussher frowned.

"And how does that help us?" he demanded.

The war-correspondent lifted his brows.

"Does it not suggest," he replied, "that the murderer had hidden in the cupboard, soiled his hands on the dusty shelves, marked the door-frame in pulling it to for greater concealment, and ultimately gone out, to do his deadly work and leave the finger-prints found on the pillow?"

"Y-yes," allowed the detective, "but that affords no clue to the identity of the murderer."

"No positive one, perhaps," admitted Paul Jerome, "but it has been a theory of yours that the uncleanness of the murderer's hands showed him to be a person of the lower classes. Now if his hands were soiled by accident, that theory is disposed of. Besides, what does his having hidden in an out-of-the-way and disused cupboard suggest?"

Mr. Ussher's forehead wrinkled, but there was no comprehension in his face.

Jerome took pity on him.

"Why," he said, "that the murderer knew his way about the house."

The detective started. "It does," he owned. "And do you know, Mr. Jerome, it squares with my investigations into that gamekeeper's story. It is evident that he did see Davenal walking in the park, near that burial-place there is there, with an elderly female. I made some experiments at the spot last night and am satisfied that he could, in the moonlight, distinguish features at the distance he indicates."

"The point of which is——" interpolated the war-correspondent.

"Why," pursued Mr. Ussher, "thanks to his mistaking the female in question for Lady Tarleton, I have an excellent guide to the person's appearance. The clue must be followed up. The woman may have been a former fellow-servant of Davenal's, and the meeting may have been due to some obscure intrigue, possibly with a criminal element. A quarrel may have sprung up and the other plotted revenge. There must be many ways of gaining surreptitious access to the Tower at night."

"Many," said Jerome, "and now, Ussher, to gratify my curiosity and test the value of my 'hint,' have you here the fingermarked pillow?"

The detective replied in the affirmative.

"The chief has it," he explained, "that and the rest of the 'pieces of conviction' as the French say. But I can get it, I've no doubt. Just a moment, sir."

He hastened out of the room, to reappear shortly with a large, flat parcel. Unfolding the wrappings, he revealed a couple of sheets of glass, laid together. Between them there reposed an oblong of linen—the soiled pillow-case. Each side could be studied through the protecting glass, yet the finger-marks were secure from modification or injury.

"Here we are," he said, "you see how the chief has had it done up. What did you think of testing?"

Paul Jerome put a thumb and finger in a vest-pocket and extracted a small metal cylinder. It contained a small lens of rare quality. He carried the glass plates to the window and examined the sandwiched linen minutely, trying the lens upon it at various distances. At last he looked up.

"Yes," he decided, "it is dust. Not earth, or grease, or soot, but dry, flocculent dust. Ussher, you had better come up to the Tower and inspect the cupboard officially."

"I will, sir," said the detective, "immediately—or I can meet you there at any time you will find convenient. You can then point out the particular cupboard and no one need suspect my interest in it."

The war-correspondent consulted his watch. "We will go upstairs together," he answered; "I have nothing better to do at the moment."

"I am much obliged to you, sir," declared Mr. Ussher, rewrapping the glass panes. He bore them off and returned. His hat was on and he was buttoning his cutaway coat of stiff pepper-and-salt tweed.

"Seems like rain, sir," he observed, as they passed out into the street and went round to gain the sea-front, en route for Groudle Tower. Paul Jerome inspected the overcast sky and the drifting purple mists that veiled the retreating tide. He marked intelligently the glassy roll of the breakers on the beach.

"Yes," he said, "the weather has been too fine for the time of year; our English climate cannot stand three fine days in Spring without getting up a thunderstorm on the strength of it."

"True, sir," agreed the other, "and I don't think the bursting of the storm is far off either."

They walked on in silence for a while and then the war-correspondent broke the silence.

"Ussher," he exclaimed, "tell me frankly, have you quite given up your suspicions of the man Hartigan?—in connection with the murder of his wife, that is."

Mr. Ussher weighed the question. "Yes, sir," he said, "your finger-print test, to my mind, was conclusive. Also, as we are aware, her ladyship's promise of a monetary gift to Davenal on the latter's leaving her service was known to Hartigan—why should he, as he asks, do anything to deprive Liver Complaint Vanquished.

Another Bile Bean Success.
Dizziness, Debility, and Headache Ended.

It is surprising how many apparently wide-apart functions are affected by disorder of the liver. There seems no connection between a person's temper and the colour of that person's eyes and skin! Yet the state of the liver affects both!

In the case of Mrs. Kelly, of Garbally, Birr (Ireland), the results of liver complaint were very serious. Here is her own story:—

"Up to July, 1901, I hardly ever had a day's sickness, but in that month I became unwell owing to getting wet. The ailment settled on my liver, so the doctor said, and for three weeks I was in bed. I trembled violently all over from liver chill, and had acute headaches. I was subject to violent retching, and vomited up everything I took. I was much affected with giddiness and often fainted away. The doctor was in attendance upon me for nearly three months, but long after he ceased to attend me I was subject to fainting fits. The fact was, I never got properly well.

The slightest shock would send me into a fainting fit, and I have fainted nearly a dozen times a day. At night I could get no sleep. I got so ill that I could do no work, and the children—I am the mother of eleven—had to do it all.

"One night my daughter Mary read about Bile Beans in the Weekly Freeman. The account told of a woman who had been cured of ailments similar to mine, so I decided to take a course of Bile Beans. I very soon found that they were doing me good, and without going through much uninteresting detail, I can say that they have now made me strong and healthy again. I strongly recommend them to all who suffer as I did."

You may not have become so much reduced by liver complaint as was Mrs. Kelly, but remember, if you suffer at all from it, you're not safe. For every form and result of liver disorder (including such results as indigestion, constipation, female disorders, constant headache, piles and liver chill), Bile Beans are a safe and certain remedy. They cure the effects of liver disorder by removing the cause. You'll get them from any medicine vendor. Don't accept substitutes.

SERIAL STORY.

himself of a share in his wife's forthcoming good luck? 'Seek whom the crime profits'—eh, sir?"

"Quite so," responded Paul Jerome. "I cannot deny your logic, Ussher; to a certain extent, it is my own. But for all that, Hartigan is a villain. I know that."

"You know it, sir?" queried the detective significantly.

"You mean can I produce proof?" said Jerome thoughtfully; "yes, and no. More no, I fancy, than yes—let it be no altogether."

He strolled on by his companion's side, his hands linked idly behind his back.

"I feel, Ussher," he added, "as if I had most of the letters that go to make up the word necessary to solve the problem in which you are professionally, I philosophically, interested. Change them about as I may they will not spell a word—and yet they are suggestive of one."

"And the word suggested," queried Mr. Ussher, "is?"

Paul Jerome looked up. The sky about them had suddenly grown dark, a muffled peal of thunder had punctuated the detective's sentence and a few huge raindrops spattered the dust of the lane. The detective and the war-correspondent were ascending the narrow hedged thoroughfare that led over the level crossing to the inland highway.

"By Jove!" said Paul Jerome, "here is the storm. We shall have to find shelter. I know these Cumberland deluges. There is an inn on the high road, just past the end of the lane."

They hurried on in the increasing downpour. The gates of the level crossing were closed, and by them waited a tall brown hack, with a habited figure in the saddle. A groom, in a familiar livery of blue and orange, was in attendance. The war-correspondent recognised the feminine rider as Irene Tarleton.

While they neared her, the train for whose transit the gates had been closed, dashed by, the gates reopened, and she urged her horse forward. A flash of lightning split the gloom around. The hack swerved from it, and Paul Jerome came into Irene's field of vision. The rain was descending with growing violence, but she checked her horse and greeted him gaily.

"Am I not nicely caught?" she said, laughing down at him between the raindrops; "and you are in no better case. We shall all be beautifully soaked."

Paul Jerome hesitated. "If I might make a recommendation," he answered, "there is an inn within a stone's throw where Ussher and I were about to take refuge. No doubt they have some sort of parlour or other private apartment where you might wait till the storm has passed off, or at least moderated."

"That will do famously," said Irene; "mamma will be shocked, but that is nothing new. And I shall be able to go home dry."

"You won't if you stop here another minute," objected the war-correspondent; "the flood-gates of Heaven are about to be opened. Please gallop on and I will follow—the place is on the roadside round the right of the lane end, the Half Brick Inn."

"I know it," rejoined Irene, and shook her hack into a smart canter.

Paul Jerome motioned to the detective, who had retreated into the shelter of a hedge.

"Come on, Ussher," he adjured him; "we shall be drowned if we don't get under cover. Can you sprint?"

Mr. Ussher smiled grimly, and broke into a trot. Jerome kept at his side, and the two men, so different in bulk and stature, dashed off through the rain. But when they reached the Half Brick and leapt into the hall of the inn, past the ostler who was leading away the brown hack and its companion, the detective's face was poppy-coloured and his eyes starting. The war-correspondent chuckled

"You haven't kept as fit as I have, Ussher," he said; "well, have something to help your wind back while I see that Miss Tarleton is comfortable."

"Humph," observed Mr. Ussher, "I thought that was Miss Tarleton—I've seen her out with you before. All right, you will find me in the bar parlour; it's a favourite haunt of mine—the entire gossip of Groudle comes to the bar parlour of the Half Brick."

Paul Jerome nodded absently. Irene Tarleton was beckoning to him from the door that flanked the bar.

He entered it and found himself in a little old-fashioned sitting-room, with a faded yet gaudy Brussels on the floor, and furnished by a very shiny suite of "burr" walnut, indistinguishable oil paintings in tarnished gilt frames, and a yellow-keyed piano. The landlady, a portly, flustered dame, was doing the honours of this stately apartment.

"Oh, please, Mr. Jerome," said Irene, "do convince these good people that I don't want any refreshment, and that I am not a scrap frightened of thunder."

"As to that," declared the war-correspondent, "I am sure Miss Tarleton is far too sensible to be alarmed at the storm. But with respect to the refreshment, I believe we may have to wait some while, or even send over to the Tower for a carriage, and I should humbly suggest to Miss Tarleton that a cup of tea would serve to while away the time."

Irene considered. "If you will share it with me," she said. "Yes."

Jerome threw his hat upon a chair.

"I shall be delighted," he answered, and turned to their buxom attendant. "A real country tea," he ordered, "with bread and butter and honey—or jam, strawberry jam for choice."

"Yes, sir," said the mistress of the Half Brick; "but won't the young lady take her hat off? It is very wet."

"Perhaps I will," assented Irene, and she felt for the pins, and took off her stiff headgear. In her severely plain, yet sweeping garments, she was a graceful, distinguished figure; her mother was not without judgment in insisting that she should wear only long gowns.

Jerome placed a chair for her, and she sat down as the landlady departed.

"I—I trust," he said quizzically, "that you are not thinking of your aunt in Yorkshire."

Irene laughed outright—and sighed.

"I'm afraid," she responded, "that these unconventional proceedings would bring me distinctly nearer that species of banishment—at all events, if mamma were to hear of them—were it not that she has already decided to whisk me off to London. We go back any day now."

The war-correspondent stood looking at her.

"Do you know," he said, "I am more than ever obliged to the storm?"

"Indeed," returned Irene; "why?"

Jerome leant on the back of her chair. "I am going to take a mental photograph," he answered; "a photograph that I shall treasure all my life, and that nothing will be able to rob me of—the picture of you, presiding in a modest little room, over a tea-tray."

Irene was pulling off her riding gloves. "And underneath," she added, flippantly, "the motto: 'One lump, or two?'"

The war-correspondent stepped quickly away—the knob of the door had been twisted, and a smart serving maid appeared with a damask-covered tray. She had bold black eyes and red lips and her skirts were coquettishly short.

With many side glances at the unusual patrons of the Half Brick, she set out the impromptu meal and withdrew.

Irene lifted her chair to the table and began to wield the heavy Queen Anne teapot of silver which had been pressed into service to do them honour.

The war-correspondent took the cup of tea she offered him and himself sat down. A momentary silence fell upon them as they addressed themselves to the simple food before them.

Jerome was watching Irene, and she was aware of it; the rain lashed the little casemented bay of the room, the place

The Dangers of Catarrh.

The great danger in catarrh rests in the fact that most people look upon the trouble as a chronic cold. In a way, this is correct; for the onset of nasal catarrh can generally be traced to a beginning in an obstinate cold, or succession of colds, in the head. The error comes in the tendency to neglect the disease, on the supposition that it is only a cold, and will disappear in time. The neglected cold becomes a chronic catarrh, which, according to the predisposition of the sufferer, may destroy the sense of taste, smell, and hearing, and may attack the throat, lungs, or stomach. The most interesting question to the catarrh patient, however, is how to get rid of the disease. Operations and cauterizations of the nose are generally advised; but the Editor of the "Review of Ear, Nose, and Throat Diseases," shows that there is another method of cure (painless and capable of home application) and publishes, with the April "Review," a "Supplement," containing full details of a large number of cases cured by this new method. A free copy of the "Review," with "Supplement," can be obtained by addressing the Editor, Drouet Institute, 10 Marble Arch, London, W. Another special feature of the "Review" is the enclosure of a Patient's Report Form, for the benefit of those who wish advice, for which no fee is charged, if given by correspondence. The Editor advises patients, however, when possible, to visit the Drouet Institute for a personal consultation with the medical staff. Consulting hours are—in the morning, 10 to 12; and in the afternoon, 2 to 4; week days only. A fee of five shillings is charged for personal consultation.

SEAWEED AS A MEDICINE

Its Marvellous Effect upon the

STOMACH, LIVER, KIDNEYS AND BLOOD

SEAWEED possesses a natural strengthening, healing, and purifying power, infinitely greater than ordinary medicines. This is now regarded as conclusive by eminent authorities, who recommend it daily, since Veno's Seaweed Tonic was first introduced.

A pure palatable extract of Seaweed is one of the principal ingredients of Veno's Seaweed Tonic. This remedy excels in the cure of INDIGESTION, WIND, HEADACHE, NERVOUS COMPLAINTS, KIDNEY TROUBLES, WEAK AND PAINFUL BACK, TORPID LIVER, FEMALE TROUBLES, POORNESS OF BLOOD, and "HABITUAL CONSTIPATION." Its most brilliant effect is produced in Stomach, Liver, and Kidney Troubles. The remarkable cures Veno's Seaweed Tonic effects even in the worst cases is positive proof of its great therapeutic value.

Ask for VENO'S SEAWEED TONIC, 1/1½ and 2/9 per bottle, at Chemists and Drug Stores.

FREE TRIAL BOTTLES. IMPORTANT TO WOMEN.

A WONDERFUL BEAUTIFIER.

A SHORT time since our readers were informed about that wonderful preparation for the complexion, Peralia, and strongly advised to try it for blackheads, acne, wrinkles, crow's feet, pimples, &c. Now listen to what a recent user has got to say about it: "In reply to your kind letter, I have taken your advice and have procured a bottle of Henderson's Peralia from Boot's Drug Stores. Well! I must say I was astonished at the result. I have spent large amounts on so-called remedies, but with indifferent success; but one bottle of Peralia entirely removed the scurvy from which I was suffering from my face, and the unnatural redness from my nose. I am now using it on my hands and arms, which it has made lovely and white, and also find it excellent for chapped hands. I am in a large milliner's shop, and all the girls in our establishment use Peralia, and think it is lovely.—Yours faithfully, Ada Fleming, Station Street, Nottingham." That ought to be a sufficient testimonial for any reader, and we hope any of them that are suffering from such disfiguring humours will act on our advice, and at once give Peralia a trial. The Peralia Company is a very enterprising firm, and they are now making a present of a dainty little book, called "Beauty's Boudoir," to every purchaser of Peralia who asks for it. We are of the opinion that none of our lady readers should be without it. By the way, the prices of Peralia, post free, in plain wrapper, are 1s. 3d., 1s. 9d., and 2s. 9d.

Many of our readers, we are sure, would like to know of a really reliable hair curler. When we say reliable, we mean one that is not affected by rain, or the heat of a ballroom. To those who are interested, and are anxious to possess neat, curly locks, we recommend "Crimpoline." It is nothing short of marvellous the manner in which this fluid sets about its business. All you have got to do is simply to apply a little to your hair for a few nights and you soon become the owner of lovely wavy ringlets. No! you need no tongs, pins nor curlers. Sounds almost to good to be true, doesn't it? Well, try it and see for yourself. Several who have used it tell us that once you get the hair properly in curl with it, you need only use it once in the week. Its price is so very moderate, too, that none of our readers need be hindered from sending for it on that account. If you write to the proprietors, enclosing 2s. or 2s. 9d., either in stamps, or a postal order, they will send you a bottle, post free, and secretly packed. Their address is the Peralia Perfumery Co., Dept. 14, Camden Street, North Shields.

smelt of lavender and furniture polish. Irene noticed the latter, Jerome the former. He was in a more romantic mood than the mischievous good temper of his companion allowed her to be.

"I feel," said the war-correspondent at last, "that if I were to look out of that window I should see a post-chaise with fresh horses, and postillions drinking confusion to the pursuers—our pursuers!—while we snatch a little refreshment to fortify us against the final stage to—Gretna Green."

Irene coloured.

"You have a powerful imagination, Mr. Jerome," she observed; "I can see nothing outside but rain." And she gazed out at the April deluge that was pouring in a continuous torrent from the sullen heavens.

"Have some bread and honey," said Paul Jerome; "the queen of the nursery rhyme, you know, was in the parlour, eating bread and honey, though we are not told that it was an April storm that kept her from going out. Or do you prefer jam—strawberry jam?"

Irene Tarleton laughed at his boyish gaiety, and took some of the latter. It was typical country preserve, with whole fruit swimming in a sea of crimson syrup. Jerome drank his tea gravely.

Suddenly he put the cup down and quoted—with great deliberation—some famous lines.

> "A loaf of bread, a cup of wine, and Thou
> Beside me singing in the Wilderness—
> Oh, Wilderness were Paradise enow."

"Not in the least appropriate," exclaimed Irene saucily, but her voice trembled; "tea is not wine, and I am not singing, and Cumberland is not a wilderness."

The war correspondent's fingers sought and closed over her hand.

"No," he said, "but it will be when you are gone. London was and Nice was, and as for Turkey, it was a howling desert."

He leant across the tea-tray and looked into her face.

"Irene," he faltered, "I'm a fool to hope to win you—a mad fool. I think it's the thunder in the air. I love, you, dear, and I'm a selfish brute—seeing that I can only offer you a middle-class home and income. But I can't bear to lose you, even to a better man. I don't seem able to think of anything but how much I want you."

Irene's hand turned in his, and clasped it, and her eyes lifted themselves to his own.

"I'm glad you're not able to," she murmured. And her tones were thrilled by the daring tenderness with which a woman unveils her heart.

Paul Jerome stooped over her hand and kissed it. But Irene drew it away and leant towards him, a scarlet spot burning on each of her cheeks.

The war-correspondent laid his own hands unsteadily on her soft shoulders and put his lips to hers. And then, for a long time, neither of them heeded the lessening splash of the rain on the window or the failing lightning that showed more and more wanly in the clearing sky.

A tap on the door roused them, and the serving-maid entered.

"Please, sir," she said, "but will you want anything more. And Mr. Ussher says can he have a word with you."

The war-correspondent sipped carelessly at a cup of cold tea, and, with an air of great indifference, rose. Irene rose too, and picked up her hat. Jerome stepped out into the bar. Mr. Ussher was contemplating, from the door of the Half Brick, the diminishing rain.

The war-correspondent went across to him. But ere he could reach the detective a dripping fly, coming from the direction of Groudle Town, drove on to the cobblestone plateau before the inn, and halting at the door, disgorged into its sanded interior a group of fisher folk

There were some two or three of the rough, familiar figures that were used to lounge about the quays and beach of Groudle, and they sustained the uneven steps of no less a person than Mr. Dennis Hartigan.

The ex-steward—wrapped in an oilskin coat that covered imperfectly a suit of clothes obviously not his own—leant heavily on his supporters. It was evident from his demeanour, and that of his companions, that something unusual and momentous had happened.

"Hullo, what's up?" exclaimed the landlord of the Half Brick, craning his neck over his beer pump handles.

One of the fishermen answered. "Mr. Hartigan will be all right," the landlord was told, "especially after a night's rest—he swims like a fish. But it's a black day for John Davenal."

"John Davenal," repeated Mr. Ussher. He had stridden forward and was inspecting the little group with a curious eye.

"Aye," retorted the speaker. "Moira, his daughter, and Mr. Hartigan were out in a small boat, got into the Middle Current, and were capsized. We got Mr. Hartigan out—but the poor lass was swept away. Rare bad luck John Davenal's had of late, and no mistake. Well, we must put Mr. Hartigan to bed and give him something hot."

"One moment," said a voice, breaking sternly into the colloquy, and Paul Jerome came to the detective's side. He had heard all.

Not a stimulant merely for the moment; but a Permanent and Agreeable Form of Nourishment

The Miss with the Mission.

"What sort of a girl is she?" "Oh, she is a miss with a mission!" "Ah!" "Her mission is seeking a man with a mansion."

A Natural Supposition.

Mrs. Sweet: "Isn't it strange that Henry will never permit Edith to open his watch?" Mr. Sweet: "Humph! There must be another girl in the case."

He'd Left it at Home.

Miss Towney (in search of the idyllic, at last meets a real, live shepherd): "Pray tell me, gentle shepherd, where is thy pipe?" The Gentle Shepherd: "I left it at oom, mum, 'cause I ain't got no baccy."

Could Go On Wanting.

"No, Harry, I am sorry; but I am sure that we could not be happy together. You know I always want my own way in everything." "But, my dear girl, you could go on wanting it after we were married."

That Stupid Post Office.

"Dear me, what a silly blunder of the Post-office people to have made," said the young wife. "What's the matter?" "Why, I've just got a letter from Harry, who is working hard in London, and it's post-marked Brighton."

His Most Valuable Possession.

Amelia: "Swear not by the moon, the inconstant moon." Augustus: "Then what shall I swear by?" Amelia: "Swear by that which you hold invaluable; something that you cannot live without." Augustus: "Then, Amelia, I love you! I swear it by my bicycle!"

Wanted His Money's Worth.

Miss Jumpuppe (to Ellerton, who is taking her out for a ride, and whose horse has turned round and refused to move): "Don't be annoyed, Mr. Ellerton. Have patience, and he will move on presently." Mr. Ellerton: "Patience, Miss Jumpuppe! Why, I am paying for the animal by the hour!"

Quoted Ancient History.

"You were a long time in the far corner of the conservatory with Mr. Willing last evening," suggested the mother. "What was going on?" "Do you remember the occasion on which you became engaged to papa?" inquired the daughter, by way of reply. "Of course I do!" "Then it ought not to be necessary for you to ask any questions." Thus gently the news was broken that they were to have a son-in-law.

A Cordial Invitation.

"I trust, Mr. Borum," said Miss Cutting, as the young man was about to depart, "that you will spend one more evening with us before we move into our new house." "Delighted, I assure you, Miss Cutting," replied Borum. "By the way, when do you expect to move?" "I'm not positive as to the exact date," she answered, "but the workmen began excavating for the foundation yesterday, and papa expects the house to be finished in about eighteen months."

He Couldn't Help it.

"Blusher is the most bashful man I ever knew." "How on earth, then, did he come to get married?" "He was too bashful to refuse."

Some Use for Her.

Crabshaw: "A jealous wife is of no use in this world." Mrs. Crabshaw: "I don't agree with you, my dear. She enables the plain typine to get a job."

Why She Coaxed Him.

Cholly: "Why did you coax me on to tell you that I loved you?" Dolly: "Because Madge told me you looked so funny when you proposed. And she's right."

He Was Affected That Way.

Chollie: "Are you fond of the water?" Elsie: "Very! At the mere thought of sailing over the bounding waves I can scarcely contain myself." Chollie: "Yes, that's the way it affects me too."

English Better than American.

He: "I am rather in favour of the English than the American mode of spelling." She: "Yes?" He: "Yes, indeed! Take 'parlour,' for instance. Having 'u' in it makes all the difference in the world."

Unsentimental.

Mr. Poeticus (entering cheerfully): "My love is like the red, red rose!" Mrs. Poeticus (looking up from the stove): "You'd look red, too, you lazy scribbler, if you'd been bending over a frying-pan for twenty minutes."

She'd Had Enough Sitting.

"Won't you take this seat?" said the gentleman in the tramcar, rising and lifting his hat. "No, thank you," said the girl with the skates over her arm. "I've been skating at the ice palace, and I'm tired of sitting down."

Billing and Cooing.

"I suppose you get a lot of honeymoon couples billing and cooing about here?" asked the inquisitive stranger of the landlord of a favourite week-end resort. "Well, ye—es," replied the man of experience, "plenty of cooing. I manage the rest."

Size Made a Difference.

Miss Clara: "You say, Ethel, that you only paid sixpence for having your gloves cleaned? Why, only the other day I was actually asked ninepence!" Miss Ethel (with a slight, but not dangerous cough): "Indeed, dear, but I suppose the size is considered?"

She Liked Being Hugged.

Gertie: "I have not seen Mr. Niccfello with you lately." Maud: "He is practising on the river." "I did not know he cared for rowing." "He doesn't, but he joined a club to please me." "To please you?" "Yes. I thought rowing would strengthen his arms."

Must Get a Better Excuse.

"Nobody can learn all there is worth knowing in this lifetime," said Mr. Meekton wisely. "And a man ought never to assume that his education is finished. I'm going to keep ahead with mine; I'm going to study astronomy." His wife looked at him sharply, and then, in a cold, hard tone exclaimed: "Leonidas, you'll have to think up some better excuse than that for staying out all night."

His Love for Her.

George had been holding his girl on his lap for over two hours, and as she weighed 190 odd pounds he was feeling a little bit tired, but he was too much of a gentleman to tell her so. "George, dear," she murmured softly, "are you having a pleasant call?" "Delightful, darling," he responded faintly. "And are you not sorry that we are to be married so soon?" "No, indeed." "And you think I am a nice girl?" she continued lovingly. "Nice girl?" repeated George enthusiastically. "Nice doesn't express it. I think you are immense."

BIBLIOTHECA BODLEIANA

What Should He Do?

"E. R." writes—"If you were in love with a girl and she told you not to write to her or see her till a certain day, what would be the best thing to do, do you think? We live at a distance of thirteen miles apart, but she comes in this district every day."

* * * * *

It all depends on the length of time during which she has forbidden you to see her. If it's only a little while, and you are sure she is fond of you, I should respect her wishes, and leave her alone for that time. Perhaps she has some family difficulty or embarrassment to which she wishes to attend quietly, in which case I am sure you would not wish to intrude on her. The whole question is: Does she reciprocate your love? If so, the first thing you should do to prove your own devotion should be to trust her. Write to her and tell her you do trust her, and feel sure she is true to you.

The Deserted Lover.

"H. A. E." is twenty-three and has been keeping company with a man two years older since she was sixteen. They have quarrelled many times, but generally made it up at short intervals. Recently they had a sort of grand opera squabble which threatened to keep them apart for the rest of time, but the man, as usual, came up repenting, and things went on as before.

* * * * *

However, when he did turn up it was to tell "H. A. E." that he had got a passing passion for another girl—a barmaid—and he wished to postpone further intimacy with "H. A. E." until he had lived it down. "H. A. E." asks my opinion on his conduct, as she fears he is going to the bad. He spends all his time at the bar behind which works the maid of his new fancy.

* * * * *

This, "H. A. E.," is often the outcome of boy and girl friendships. I do not doubt that you are thoroughly well suited to each other, since you have been more or less inseparables for seven years. But I should think you have been more chums than lovers. He has suddenly awakened to the thought that a man can have feelings stronger than friendship, or even devotion, and the barmaid is at present reaping the fruits of his awakening.

* * * * *

I advise you to leave him severely alone. Tell him that, until he has made up his mind as to yourself, that you wish to sever all communications. Probably after a little while his infatuation will have run its course, and that over he will return to his old love, all the better for the temporary breach.

A Forward Miss.

"BASHFUL MAN."—Young ladies who ask strange young men for primroses in railway carriages are not usually to be recommended. Give the primroses, by all means, if the young lady wants them, but do so in such a way that she will see that you have nothing else to offer her.

Engaged at Eighteen.

"UNCERTAIN" wants to know whether eighteen is too young for a girl to become engaged. A friend of hers who is this age is just engaged to a man of twenty.

* * * * *

It all depends on the persons concerned, "UNCERTAIN." Some persons are much older at eighteen than others of even a much more mature age, and in their case, of course, it is not too young. Ordinarily, twenty or twenty-one is quite early enough. Before that neither a girl nor a man really knows their own mind, so far as the state of matrimony is concerned.

A Widower in the Way.

"JACK."—Yes, I am always glad to hear from the "boys." You are in love with a girl who professes to return your love. But she carries on relations with a widower much older than herself, and cannot keep appointments with you because of engagements with him. All the time she professes to be fonder of you than of anyone else.

* * * * *

It is certain that you cannot play second fiddle to the widower. Besides, he would most probably drown your music. These widowers have wonderful ways with women. Be frank with her, and make her take her choice. If she loves you, she must give up the widower.

False Accusations.

"G. T. L." has been keeping company with a young lady for several years. She now accuses him of certain things which she has heard, but they are not true. She also tells him he is not straightforward, but fails to explain in what way. She wants to continue friendship with him. What is he to do?

* * * * *

There is only one solution to this problem, "G. T. L.," and that is to tell the young lady that, unless she will explain herself, and so enable you to contradict the false charges made against you, you do not see what advantage is gained by continuing to be friends. If she really cares for you she will do this; if not, I think you will be happier apart.

A Complex Affair.

"ANXIOUS" is one of those young men who, in the words of the song, "must love someone." At first he took a great fancy to a friend of a lady friend of his, and they walked out together. Then this girl found she could not keep any more appointments with "ANXIOUS." He promptly asked his lady friend to find him someone else, which she did. "ANXIOUS" walked with this young lady, but disliked her.

* * * * *

Then the first young lady and the second one quarrelled over "ANXIOUS." He, however, remains devoted to the first one. How should he approach her to resume the intimacy? He says she lives a long way from him, and he does not wish to write to her at present.

* * * * *

How you are to get intimate with a girl if you cannot go and see her, and don't wish to write to her, is more than I can say, unless you get Marconi to fit you both up with wireless telegraphy. You had better devote your Sundays—which I suppose are free—to meeting the girl. I cannot see any other way out of it.

Cynthia.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

MISS CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st., and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Risholm Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."

"West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets, which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

Mrs. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

Mr. MCLEOD, 44 Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

COUNT EHRENWAUD, of Listorp, Sweden, writes, 9th Oct., 1899: "The person who took Tablets lost 18lb. during the cure.

Mr. GIBBS, 147 Richmond Park, Kimberworth, Rotherham, says: "Since I began with them they have reduced me 2st. 3lb., and I am pleased to say I am a great deal better in health and in every way."

Mrs. FENTON, 11 Wood Street, Tyldesley, writes: "Been fat all my life, but now your Tablets tell a tale. I have lost 17lb. already and am delighted."

Mrs. MARY WILLIAMS, of Old Yard, near Redol, Bagilt, Wales, writes Nov. 22nd, 1898: "Your Tablets reduced me 2st., and have benefited me greatly."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Mrs. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablet has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

Mrs. PEARCE, Armstrong Road, Benwell: "Reduced from 12st. to 9½st., and do not get any heavier."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs., says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mrs. ROLLITT, of North Farm, Letwell, says: "Tablets have done a world of good—reduced 14lb. already without altering diet."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Mrs. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets.

Miss JANE CARTER of Forthampton House, Tewkesbury, says: "The Tablets are of the greatest valu I am reduced many stone, and shall be pleased to recommend them."

Mr. THOS BLAKELY, of 37 The Grove, Bedford, writes: "I have lost a little over 42lb. since taking your Tablets, and my case causes much local interest."

Miss F. L. BALL, 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets. They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

Miss PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets. I have lost 2st., and am sufficiently reduced."

The Arm in the Wall.

The Story of a Strange Deliverance.

Containing the Incident depicted on the Cover.

"I CAN'T take this, sir; it's bad!" said the landlady of the inn, her usually jolly face becoming very grave.

"Bad?" echoed Quinton Chalmers in surprise. He picked up the half-crown and looked at it doubtfully. "Do you mean to say that this is a counterfeit?"

"Certainly!" responded the landlady, unbending and looking sympathetic. She perceived that his astonishment was genuine, and that he was not knowingly uttering base coin. "There's a lot about, sir!"

"There's one too many about for me!" declared Quinton sorrowfully. "Misfortunes never come alone. I'm down on my luck, and, to make matters worse, half a crown out of the ten and six I possess proves to be spurious. Well, nail it to the counter!"

He tendered another coin in payment of the frugal meal which he had ordered, and departed.

"I am not against making money," he reflected, as he sauntered along, "but I wouldn't stoop to make it out of poor beggars like Quinton Chalmers! Yes, I remember; there has been an outcry about the amount of spurious money in circulation. H'm, I should like to have the pleasure of seeing the coiners in the dock, confound them! What's the next move?"

This last remark applied to his own movements; the answer was soon forthcoming.

"To Bilstone. I shall get there by the evening along these country roads and lanes. Put up there for the night, then search about for work."

In pursuance of this plan he pushed on for some time, meeting very few people, and absorbed in his own reflections. He pulled himself up suddenly and uttered an exclamation of wonder.

"Surely I must have been mistaken! Yet it seemed real enough as I lifted my eyes. Let me get a little nearer!"

He quickened his steps in the direction of a long, blank wall, probably the surrounding wall of a country mansion. He kept his eyes on one particular spot in the wall as he hurried towards it.

He was close to the spot now, and he waited for the reappearance of the object. Presently he saw something emerging from the apparently solid mass, and he involuntarily clenched his fist in his excitement. A hand projecting from the masonry! It moved, and there gradually appeared a bare arm! It raised itself and its fingers were ready to touch or clutch at something.

An uncanny sensation crept over Quinton's body, causing a tingling from his head to his feet. His eyes were fixed on this strange object, projecting from the long, high, blank wall, and he could not have moved to save his life. The spell was removed only when the arm shrank into the masonry, as it seemed, drawing the hand with it.

"Heavens!" gasped Quinton Chalmers, recovering the power of speech. "What is the meaning of that? I am not dreaming; it's real enough; but is it a warning or is someone imprisoned there?"

The easiest way to discover something of the truth was to clamber to the spot, where, as he could now see, a hole had been made in the wall. If some joke-loving individual were on the other side—— But no! How could a practical joker have been sure that he would see the arm when it first appeared, while Quinton was at a distance? It was not a difficult matter to reach that hole by digging his penknife into the mortar and making footholds. In two minutes he was on a level with the hole and was peering through.

It was no mere surrounding wall, with path or grass on the other side, for it was dark within and he could distinguish nothing. He was lifting himself up an inch or two higher, in his endeavour to get a better view, if possible, when he saw two gleaming eyes, and the next instant the arm was thrust out and the fingers gripped his throat in an iron clutch.

Quinton vainly tried to wriggle himself free; he could not retain his hold and yet do something to liberate himself, and it was that thought which suggested a successful device. He simply let go all hold, so that the whole weight of his body was thrown on the mysterious arm, dragging it against the jagged hole. Quinton fancied that he heard a cry, the grip was loosened, and he fell to the ground in a heap, fortunately with no more serious injury than a bruise or two.

"I'm going to get to the bottom of this!" muttered Quinton determinedly and angrily. "I must see what this means, and if anyone has been playing with me, why that someone is going to catch it!"

It was a fair climb, and a somewhat risky one, to reach the top of the wall, but Quinton essayed it with the help of his knife, and succeeded. He discovered that the wall formed, for a considerable length, one side of some irregular buildings, like sheds made of brick instead of planks.

At the spot where he had seen the arm the shed was higher than the rest, and possibly consisted of two storeys. From the top of the wall to the roof of that building was not much of a drop, so Quinton edged along the wall, schoolboy fashion, till he reached this shed and then let himself drop as gently as he could to the roof.

There were no skylights, but some small holes, about an inch in diameter, which reminded Quinton of the air-holes in the boxes used for conveying live creatures.

He lay flat on this sloping roof, his head lower than his body, and peered over the farther side in search of windows, but there were none in the shed. There was a door for giving admission to the ground floor.

"This is mysterious! Have they got a wild man of the woods in this box? I'll call in at the holes!"

He turned himself about, and placing his mouth against one of the air-holes, he cried, "Hallo!"

Once more he thought he heard a cry. He placed his left ear flat over one hole and listened; he heard a cry which he recognised as "Help!"

Quinton's mind was made up immediately. This was not a private asylum, for no one would be allowed to keep lunatics confined in such a cage. There was foul play of some sort, and Quinton meant to unravel the mystery of the arm.

He saw that some slates could be removed, and he had them off in a very brief space of time. The opening thus made permitted more light to enter an apartment which had no other means of obtaining relief from its darkness and gloom.

"Nice place, that, to keep a human being!" muttered Quinton, as he thrust his head into the space and looked round. "Anyone there?" he called out. "Gracious!" he ejaculated hastily, drawing his head back. "What's that?"

He had at first taken the strange thing to be a wild animal, but as he surveyed it more closely he perceived that the creature was a human being.

It was a man, whose age it was not possible to guess with any degree of accuracy; his hair was long and hung about his shoulders like a mane, his beard and moustache were also long and unkempt, his eyebrows seemed at times to hide the small, frightened eyes. His face was brown and grimy.

Near him lay a ragged coat, which he had probably taken off in order to thrust his arm through the hole in the wall. If he wore a shirt, no part of it was visible now, and his arms were bare to the shoulder.

"Who are you, and why are you here?" queried Chalmers in bewilderment.

"So you have tracked me at last!" exclaimed the man submissively. "I thought I had killed you, long ago—I cannot remember how long, for I have lost count of the days and nights! Well, come in and take me! It will be a release from this place, at least! Then I did not kill you?"

"It isn't years ago," replied Chalmers easily, peering through the opening once more. "It isn't many minutes since you tried to throttle me! I say, I've come to help you! I'm coming down. No tricks, now!"

Reckless of the consequences, Quinton dropped through, feet first, and alighted on the floor close to the strange occupant of the prison, as the young man now called it. It was about twelve feet from the roof to the floor, so that it was not possible for the prisoner himself to get to the roof and escape, supposing that he desired to do so.

"Now!" said Quinton cheerfully. "What can I do for you? Tell me all about yourself."

"You are not afraid of me?" asked the man. "I tried to kill you years ago, you will remember! You know that I am Will Bristowe!"

"William Bristowe!" echoed Quinton, stepping back in surprise. "Ah, yes! I understand. You mistake me for my father, whom you struck in a quarrel five years ago. You disappeared, doubtless because you feared the arm of the law. But you didn't kill him, I am thankful to say, and he died of fever thirteen months ago. Do you understand?"

The man sat down on his rickety stool and passed his hand over his hairy face. He sat still, in deep reflection, for quite five minutes, but when he looked up at Quinton the young man saw the light of understanding in his eyes.

"Yes, I see it all now!" he said slowly. "I seem to have been dreaming. Then I am not a murderer, and my little girl—she must be a big girl now!—is not living under the stigma."

"My father tried to find you before he died, as he wished you to know that he felt that he had provoked you to the quarrel. Your daughter——"

"Tell me about her!" pleaded the man eagerly. "Millie was fourteen then. Where is she?"

"Oh—er—she's all right!" returned Quinton evasively. "But tell me about yourself. What have you been doing?"

"Making money!" laughed the man, and his laugh made Quinton's flesh creep. "Look!"

In the corner to which he pointed was a piece of sacking covering a heap. Bristowe threw aside the sacking, disclosing to the astonished gaze of the younger man a pile of new money—sovereigns, half sovereigns, and silver coins of all denominations. They were heaped together indiscriminately.

"Feel them!" cried Bristowe, with another hysterical laugh. "Catch!"

He dug his hands into the heap and threw the contents into the air just above Quinton, so that a golden and silvern shower fell about him.

"Money, all money!" laughed Bristowe. "Money for fools to get hold of—made on the premises. Ha, ha!"

"Stop it!" cried Quinton authoritatively. "Sit down and explain!"

The man was strange, but certainly not mad; probably he would become insane if left to brood over his supposed misdeed and confined in that prison. He seated himself as quietly as a child, and, after further urging, told his story in broad lines.

"So I did not kill him! Thank Heaven! I ran away, leaving my daughter to the mercy of strangers, because I feared the hangman's noose! My sole care was to hide! I secreted myself by day and travelled by night, eating what I could pick up on the roads, till I fainted by the wayside.

"When I came to, I was in a room. A man said to me: 'I know you! You are a die sinker and metal engraver; your name is Bristowe; you are the very man!' I begged him to save me, not to give me up for the murder. He listened to me; then he smiled and said he would help me to hide if I would help him.

"I agreed to do what he wanted if he would only save me. He brought me here by night, as the hunt was hot after me for murder, he said. Then I found that he wanted me to make dies for coining counterfeit money, and to help in touching up the coins after they had been taken from the moulds. I refused, but he threatened to hand me over to justice and I agreed."

"They deceived you!" cried Quinton. "They took advantage of your fears and your nervousness, and I've no doubt that they threatened to disgrace your daughter and all that sort of thing, so you fell into their trap. In reality, you had nothing to be afraid of. That man had seen you before, of course?"

"Yes," replied Bristowe sadly. "I made the dies and they coined the money. For a long time I worked, not in this room, and I cared nothing for the robbery in which I was assisting. Then I rebelled; they threatened me, but I said that I would face the charge.

"I was getting tired of it, my conscience would not let me rest. But they would not let me go! They kept me in this room, without light, neglected and with scanty food. Sometimes they beat me until I do some work here by the aid of a lamp!"

"The brutes!" cried Quinton indignantly. "Then you made a hole in the wall?"

"Yes, with a blunt knife, and I covered it artfully from inside! You would never detect where it is! I put my arm out as a signal when I think they will not see it. I saw you peering through there, and I thought that the dead had come to life. How you resemble your father! In an agony of terror, I clutched at your throat!"

"It was a tight grip!" exclaimed Quinton, feeling his throat. "Well, I should help you to get out in any case, but I have other incentives than pure humanity!" To himself he added: "How can I tell him now that I am in love with his daughter, but that I am too poor to ask her hand in marriage and that I have lost trace of her since leaving home? I wonder where she went to? Perhaps she will write to me and the letter will be sent on soon as I have an address!"

"You will never get me away from here," sighed Bristowe. "There is no door!"

"Then we will go through the roof!" was the prompt response. "But how do you get out if there is no door?"

"They move the floor!" returned Bristowe grimly.

"Move the floor! Well, we'll attend to those rascals later; I owe them something for that half-crown, for I'll be bound they made it! Now, I'll get on your shoulders and so spring up and grab at the woodwork and scramble through.

Digitized by Google

You stand on that stool and make a spring for my hand, which I will hold down as far as I can. It will be a wrench, but I'm strong and I think we can manage to get you high enough to clutch the woodwork also. Stand here!"

Bristowe was all excitement. He trembled so violently that Quinton had to tell him to "brace up!" The young man got him in position and was soon in a kneeling attitude on Bristowe's shoulders. Another effort, and he was standing upright, ready to spring and relieve the trembling Bristowe of a weight that was making him shake.

"It's moving!" suddenly screamed Bristowe.

Quinton realised the situation when he felt Bristowe staggering. He made a tremendous effort and leapt towards the ceiling, but he was too late; the movement of the floor had upset Bristowe and taken him from the required position just a second before the leap was made. Quinton missed his mark and came down, face undermost, horizontally, and below him he saw, in a rapid glance, a spectacle that would have chilled the heart of the bravest.

The floor was rolling away, like a sliding door. Bristowe was retreating to the farther end, waiting till the ground should be taken from under his feet and precipitate him into the depths into which Quinton Chalmers was falling.

Below them was a furnace and a huge crucible or melting pot, filled with molten metal, and round about were several presses and machines. Quinton was falling straight over the seething mass of metal, which seemed waiting to receive him and enfold him in its boiling embrace. A horrible death! Small wonder that even so brave a man as Quinton Chalmers should cry aloud for help!

But simultaneously with the cry that was wrenched from him, the young man tried a trick which he had performed at the gymnasium; he gave himself a quick jerk, turned a half somersault, and came to the ground on his feet right by the side of the cauldron of death.

The force of the impact when he touched the ground threw him forward into the arms of one of the three men who had stood below, calmly watching the impending destruction of a fellow-creature—watching calmly because they had deliberately planned it.

"Settle him!" cried another. "He knows too much, and if he goes we shall all be lagged!"

The three of them seized Quinton, who struggled powerfully with them, so that they could not keep him under control.

"Knock him on the head!" cried one with an oath, and the man addressed released his hold of Quinton in order to obey the order.

He raised a bar of lead and swung it over his head, but it was caught from behind by someone who swung on it and thus tumbled the ruffian over. Then a girl ran forward and rained blows on the faces of Quinton's assailants with her small fists.

"Let him go!" she cried. "Oh, Quinton, they will kill you!"

"I'm coming!" screamed a strident voice from above.

Bristowe had been saved because the floor did not roll away entirely. He had walked along a very narrow ridge of wood with the agility of a cat and had reached an upright ladder, which he was now descending in double quick time.

"You here, Millie!" cried Quinton in the midst of his struggles, and he redoubled his efforts to get rid of his opponents.

Bristowe was on the scene a moment later, and the third ruffian rejoined the fray. He found that it took him all his time to deal with Millie, who clung to him in order to prevent him from taking part in the fight between the four men.

Bristowe was not strong enough to do much more than create a diversion.

He was soon toppled over, but the diversion gave Quinton Chalmers his chance. He contrived to get free for a few seconds, just in time enough to seize a bar of metal. He dealt one ruffian a severe blow, stretching him senseless at the moment that the other struck Bristowe to the ground.

With a cry of rage, Chalmers went for this fellow, who turned tail and ran. Millie's opponent also considered it good policy to run, and the lovers were left to themselves, for Bristowe was dazed and lay motionless.

"Millie, dear," exclaimed Quinton, folding her in his arms and kissing her.

"We must not stay, Quinton! They will kill us! I know that they intended to kill that poor man this evening, but I could not get away to secure help. Then they found that someone had got into the room above, and they resolved to kill both. Oh, Quinton, I did not dream that it was you! But come, come! Oh, how shall we get out!"

Bristowe was struggling to his feet; he had not recognised his daughter and she did not know him.

"What a strange reunion!" Quinton Chalmers, notwithstanding the peril of their position, could not help uttering this remark. "If we venture through that door," he added, "we may be shot down! Can we get through that hole in the roof?"

"Easily!" exclaimed Bristowe joyfully, much to Quinton's surprise. "See this ladder straight against the wall? I came down it, you know. It's a double one; half will slide up above the other and that will take us to the roof!"

"Hurrah!" cried Chalmers. "We can use their own appliances for our convenience. Up with it!"

He pushed the movable half upwards, mounting the rungs of the fixed half for that purpose. He got on the roof and made the hole larger, after which Millie ascended, followed by Bristowe, who had secured the lower door.

It was comparatively easy to get to the top of the wall, but the difficulty came in getting down to the ground. Chalmers went first, clinging to almost nothing till he had only a twelve feet drop and then he let go.

He held out his arms to catch Millie, who bravely trusted herself to her lover and was caught in his arms. It was a rude shock for both, but no injuries were sustained. Bristowe followed, and Chalmers contrived to break his fall, but this exploit resulted in a sprained ankle.

"You go and leave me!" he said resignedly. "You must not be caught!"

"You must hobble along on one foot till we get away!" declared Chalmers. "Once near a habitation, we can send for a force of men to trap those scoundrels."

"I will run for help!" said Millie decisively. "I cannot fight, so I must act as messenger. I hope, though, that I shan't meet them on my way."

The coiners were heard coming just then, but before they arrived Millie reappeared with a small rescue party, and the coiners knew that their game was up.

The rescuers considered that they were not strong enough to attack the citadel of the coiners, so they helped our three friends to find a refuge and then sent for a strong force of police and labourers.

While they were doing their wholesome work, Millie was telling why she had gone off so suddenly.

"I had the offer of a good situation," she explained, "and I was to go at once. I packed hastily and went with the lady, intending to write you. I have written since, but I now know that my letters were intercepted. I found that I was being made a dupe in various ways for passing bad money and I decided to leave. The lady would not let me go; I was kept in the grounds, and only this morning I found that coining was being carried on down there in an extensive manner. How cruel they have been to that poor man! I wonder who he is?"

It was on the following morning that Quinton took his sweetheart to see the late prisoner; he had been bathed, his hair and beard cut, and a general transformation effected.

The reunion was a touching one, and Chalmers left father and daughter to themselves.

"The ways of Fate are not to be fathomed!" observed Chalmers that evening. "I was down on my luck and came this way, guided—who shall say?—by the Divinity that shapes our ends! And we three, separated and lost to one another, are brought together by the strange appearance of an arm in the wall!"

Angela's Way.

Telling of a Soldier's Wooing.

The Spring sun shone brightly on the silver of Dr. Hayward's well-furnished breakfast table in his house at the Naval Hospital at Haslar, where he sat with his wife, daughter, and a friend of the latter.

The doctor himself, an elderly man with a grey, torpedo-cut naval beard was engrossed in the newspaper; his wife, a timid-looking woman, with traces of a delicate style of beauty, sat opposite him dispensing the tea and coffee; his daughter Kitty, a lively and decidedly pretty girl, was on one side, and her friend Angela Middleton, in half mourning, was on the other.

Angela Middleton was tall, with a perfectly-proportioned figure, a dark, oval face, clear cut features, and the dreamy eyes of an enthusiast, which, however, only served to soften the look of decision about her mouth and chin.

She had reached the age of twenty-five, was the possessor of a considerable fortune, and had been her own mistress since girlhood, for her mother had always been more or less of an invalid.

At nine the doctor threw down his newspaper.

"Would you girls like to go round the hospital with me this afternoon? I shall not be very busy, and could show you round the most interesting parts."

"What do you say, Angela?" said Kitty. "Would you like to go?"

"Thank you very much, Dr. Hayward," answered Angela. "I am very interested in everything that is being done for our soldiers and sailors. I wish I had been free to do some nursing when the war began."

"Some of the soldiers we have here have been pretty well knocked about," said the doctor. "It is wonderful what they go through and yet often recover. In some cases though, where it seems they have only a living death before them, one would almost wish that the shot had done for them at once. Well, good-bye, I'll see you later," and the good doctor left the room.

Kitty looked sober for once, and then said:

"I know Dad was thinking of that poor Captain Graham, of the Blue Marines. It is dreadfully sad for him. He lies so still and patient, Dad says; never complaining, though surely death would be preferable to the life that is before him."

"What is the matter with him?" asked Angela.

"Oh, I don't understand it properly, but I believe he got a shot in his back—or perhaps it was a shell; at any rate a splinter or something is pressing on the spinal cord, and he is paralysed, besides suffering horribly at times."

"But can't they get it out?"

"You see, my dear," said Mrs. Hayward, "the poor young man is badly off, and seems to have no relations, and he has got into such a weak state, my husband thinks he would sink under an operation. My husband always says it halves a man's chances of recovery if he has no object for which to live."

"The moral of which is," said Kitty, "'provide yourself with an object' in case of accident. I have several, so if Dad has to perform an operation on me I shall have at least double the chances of recovery of the ordinary staid and proper person like you, my dear Angela."

Early in the afternoon the doctor took the two girls round to view the most interesting features of the hospital, and lastly he said, "Now come along, and see one of my patients. It will cheer him up to see someone—I have got him out here in a sunny corner in his wheeled chair"—and he whisked them out of the building across the square piece of green to the officers' quarters.

"Miss Middleton, this is Captain Graham, of whom you have heard me speak. You know my daughter, Graham?"

"Excuse my rising," said a pleasant voice, "but circumstances over which I have no control make it impossible."

With a heart aching with pity, Angela looked at this wreck of a once strong and healthy man. The finely-modelled head covered with close-cropped, fair, curly hair, the bright blue eyes with the wistfulness of pain in their depths, the pale, sunken cheeks, the broad shoulders made for strength, but now only suggesting a massive frame, and, worst of all, the motionless legs, which even under the rug gave a suggestion of death rather than repose.

"And but for that shot," she thought to herself, "he would be walking about like other men, full of the joy of living with which the Springtime fills one's veins."

However, feeling instinctively that pity if shown too openly would gall him, she fell into a discussion of ordinary subjects.

She found him a well-read man, evidently of a thoughtful disposition, and the time passed very quickly as they discovered many points in common.

"Well," said the doctor at last, "I must be off. If you young ladies, however, like to stay and chat a bit I will come and fetch you in time for tea."

So they stayed, and kept up a lively three-cornered conversation for half an hour, at the end of which time Dr. Hayward appeared and bore them off.

"Thank you so much," said the invalid, with a bright smile, "you can't think what good it has done me to see you. It is a bit dull lying here day after day," though, he added quickly, "the doctor is awfully good to me, and often runs in for a little chat."

"Good-bye," said Kitty, with a bright smile and a tender glance of pity which belied her light manner.

"Don't let your temperature go up, and then perhaps Dad will let us come again soon."

"Good-bye," said Angela, giving her hand in her turn. "I am going to look out all the most interesting books I can find and send them to you."

"Not too much of that, young lady," said the doctor. "He is only allowed a little reading because of the strain on his eyes."

At this statement a passion of pity suffused Angela's eyes and they met Graham's for a moment. Then almost hating herself for moving so freely, she turned and went.

Alec Graham had been startled by the look he had seen in her eyes. It seemed to him that for that moment he had seen into her soul, and for the time he forgot his own pain in sympathy for the mental agony he knew she was enduring. He remembered he had felt like that when he witnessed the dumb sufferings of the horses and oxen after a battle.

That night Angela resolved many things in her mind. She had bitterly felt her inaction when war was declared. Her mother was in a dying condition, and could not be left, so she was debarred from going, as so many others did, to care for the wounded and suffering.

She had no brother but one many years older than herself, a bachelor, in the Foreign Office, so she could not even feel she was sending out her dearest to risk his life for his country. She had subscribed largely to all the subscription lists, and felt it was a poor thing compared with what others were doing.

Now for the first time she had come face to face with the sufferings of those who had done what she had longed to do, who had fought as she would have done, had she been a man, and all her feelings of pride and grief for the Army in general centered on these cases with which she had personally come in contact.

She determined to remain inactive no longer, and announced her resolution at breakfast next day.

"Doctor, can't I do anything for the poor fellows in your hospital?"

The doctor looked up, and asked abruptly:

"What d'you think you could do?"

She faltered a little—

"Could I not read to them? Or write letters for them? Anything to cheer them and make the time pass less heavily."

"Certainly you could, the sick-bay men have not much time for that kind of thing."

"But Joseph, dear," interposed Mrs. Hayward. "Would it be quite right for her—proper, I mean."

"Right—proper," thundered the doctor; "of course it is! It is more—it is a duty. A service that should be offered willingly and not commanded!"

"That's a hit at me," said Kitty in an aside.

"But look here, young woman," said the doctor, drawing his bushy brows together; "if you take it up you must stick to it, at least for the three months you are here, and you must be regular if you are to be any real use. No flying off to tennis parties and entertainments and forgetting all about the poor blue-jackets who are expecting you."

"Indeed I quite understand that," answered Angela, delighted that the doctor took up her idea so readily. "I would rather do that than go about amusing myself."

The doctor was a man of determination and liked to go straight ahead once a course had been adopted.

"Well, suppose you come to-day at three. You can then spend two hours in the hospital—or you can come in the morning if you wish, any time after ten."

"Very well," said Angela; "I will begin with the morning, and as I make more friends, I shall be glad to increase my hours."

"Better so than the other way," and the doctor nodded approval.

"I will come too, Dad," said Kitty.

"Don't you think, doctor," said Angela, who was pursuing her own train of thought, "instead of sending Captain Graham those books I might take them and read to him? You said he must spare his eyes."

"Certainly, my dear, an excellent idea!"

"But, Joseph," put in Mrs. Hayward timidly.

"My dear woman, Captain Graham is completely paralysed in the lower half of his body, and if he goes on as he is doing now, he has not six months to live," said the doctor emphatically. "Anything that can be done to alleviate the suffering of those six months ought to be done, let Mrs. Grundy say what she will."

At this announcement of the fate in store for the poor young fellow, silence fell on the group until the doctor had found his cap and prepared to depart.

"Then Kitty and I will come over at eleven, and perhaps we may ask for you, if you can spare the time to introduce us to some of your patients.

"Certainly ask for me; I shall be somewhere about—Good-bye for the present," and he was off.

The morning visit was fairly successful though Angela found it a little difficult to shake off her shyness in spite of her earnestness, but there was no shyness about Kitty who knew many of them already, and could ask after their mothers, sweethearts, and wives in a way which soon put them at their ease also.

The visit to Captain Graham was an unmixed success, he was so unfeignedly glad to see them and looked so much brighter and better when they left, that Dr. Hayward congratulated them in his gruff manner when he came in later to take them back with him.

This was the beginning of many happy days for Angela, who at last had found an outlet for the love and sympathy with which she was always overflowing for the weak and suffering.

Day by day, however, the hour spent with Captain Graham became more precious to her, as they grew more intimate and she learnt more of him and his life.

She learnt how alone he was in the world and her heart went out for his loneliness all the more that her own mother's recent death had left her in similar condition. The loneliness that has no one whose thought answers your thought, whose heart responds to your heart.

He was the only child of an only child; his mother's relations, who were highly connected, had been offended at her marriage to a penniless young officer and had ceased to have any communication with her for some time before her husband died and left her virtually friendless.

All this he told her by degrees and then as they grew more intimate she learnt how his mother had pinched and saved that he might follow his father's profession; and how she had bravely sent him from her with her blessing though her heart was breaking.

How it had only needed for her to see his name, placed by mistake among the killed at Graspan, for her frail body, weakened by much suffering and actual privation, to sink under the shock. Now when he was brought home the wreck that he was, feeling she at least would rejoice over him, it was only to learn that she was already buried.

"I ought really to have been killed, Miss Middleton. It is always a mistake for a dead man to come to life, and when it is to such a life as this, why, it was hardly worth the trouble, was it?" he said rather bitterly.

"Don't talk like that, Captain Graham," said Angela brokenly; "I can't bear it."

"Pardon me," he said with a look of distress; "I am a brute. I forgot how much you feel for all the poor fellows who have been hit. Let us read and forget this miserable personality."

Angela took up the book they had been reading and continued reading aloud and discussing the points that arose until it was time for her to go back for tea.

Two months of Angela's stay with the Haywards passed in this manner and her visits to the hospital were continued with the greatest regularity. Kitty was somewhat spasmodic in her attendance but Angela never missed a day.

One evening Mrs. Hayward remarked.

"I think my dear Angela, it would be as well if you did not go to visit Captain Graham any more, at least for the present."

"Why?" asked Angela in a low tone.

"People are—people are talking."

Angela flushed the slow, painful flush of a dark complexion, and then turned very pale.

"What do they say?"

"Oh," answered Mrs. Hayward awkwardly. "You know the kind of things people say—when—whenever they have a chance——"

"Yes, of course," broke in Kitty tempestuously; "we know the kind of thing—Goes every day to read to Captain Graham—How very extraordinary. It is not even as though she were a relative—only the merest acquaintance—still, he is a handsome young man, my dear, in spite of his being a cripple, and some girls—Faugh! I know them! They make me sick. The horrid cats!" And the last word was brought out with extraordinary emphasis.

"Kitty, my dear!" cried her mother in gentle reproof.

"I mean it!" she continued. "Not one of them would cross the road to do a kindness to anyone. So anxious are they not to have to say—'We have done the things we ought not to have done,' that their whole lives consist in leaving 'undone the things they ought to have done.'"

Kitty was the more vehement that she had been aware of these rumours long before they had reached her mother's ears, and had loyally combated them and refused even to speak of them to her friend.

Angela had regained her control and made up her mind.

"I am very sorry," she said quietly; "that people should misjudge me, but I think I am old enough to decide for myself and I shall make no difference in my conduct on account of what 'they' say."

"Bravo!" cried Kitty.

"My dear Angela, really! Of course, I cannot insist, but I am sure you are wrong."

"One can only do what one thinks right. It is useless to try to act according to another person's idea of right more especially those of whom one knows nothing."

"It is more useless, Angela," said Mrs. Hayward impatiently, "to attempt to fight against the opinion of the world."

"There can be no wrong in that I have endeavoured to bring a little pleasure into the life of a fellow creature, that I have tried to give him courage to face his life such as it is, and to learn the lesson of his suffering. I know I am a better woman for it," she added in a low tone.

"Of course, we know there is no wrong in it, but still, if it makes people talk—it is not even as if you could marry him—situated as he is, it is an impossibility."

"Mother, how can you!" cried Kitty.

Once more Angela flushed slowly.

"Why?" was all she found strength to utter.

"Why? Of course he would not marry, cripple as he is, and likely to remain an invalid all his life, if he lives at all."

This was the first time the possibility of marrying Captain Graham had presented itself to her mind, and now she saw suddenly where all this intercourse with him had led her.

She knew him as she knew no other person on earth; life, apart from him, would henceforth be of no value and life devoted to his service would be the highest happiness for which she could hope.

Even as this flashed into her mind she said:

"I shall do as I think right."

It was of no use for Mrs. Hayward to argue, Angela was a person of determination and could not be moved. That night Mrs. Hayward told her husband of the matter, and he promised to speak to Angela.

Accordingly the next day he spoke to Angela, but did not succeed in altering her resolution, in fact, he was so pleased with her determination that he found himself forgetting his rôle of mentor and agreeing with her instead of lecturing. However, he saw the best course would be, to plainly put the case to Capt. Graham, and leave him to act as his honour bade him.

"You see, my dear fellow, it's like this. She, for all she thinks she knows the world, does not understand how scandal grows out of nothing, and feeling secure in her innocence, wishes to persist in the course she feels sure is right, but we know, don't we, that not all the righteousness in the world can make up to a woman for a breath of scandal on her good name?"

Poor Capt. Graham was suffering tortures, beads of perspiration stood on his brow, but there was not the slightest doubt in his mind how he ought to act.

"Her brother is her only near relation. I will write to him and put it all before him. I ought to have foreseen this, but it has been Heaven while it lasted."

"My poor fellow," said the compassionate doctor, "I cannot help telling you that I think that there is just a chance of your recovery if you could get strong enough to undergo an operation by Sir William Graves—but it would be kill or cure."

"Don't doctor, it is only bearable if I do not allow myself to think there is any possibility, I dare not let myself imagine for one instant I should be justified in asking such a sacrifice of her."

"No! No! You are right," said the doctor, and wringing his hand with almost painful intensity, he left him.

Alec Graham suffered worse that night than he had ever suffered before, but by the morning light he had steadfastly put from him the temptation of taking advantage of her pity, and the next day he wrote at some length to her brother. The latter part of his letter ran as follows:

"It cannot be necessary for me to tell you that if I were a whole man, there is no Heaven I should desire beyond winning her love; but as it is, I, a dying—I may say half-dead—man dare not allow myself to consider it.

"That she, in her divine pity and nobleness of heart, should have laid herself open to vulgar gossip, does not bear thinking about. Will you put it plainly before her and tell her, as no one not having your authority can do, that her good name is worth more than my broken life, that she must cease her visits to the cripple; tell her, moreover, that he has learnt the lesson she has striven to teach him, he will no longer be content to slip away into death, he will take up his burden and try to bear it."

Hugh Middleton was a man of sense and discernment, he knew this was a man to be trusted, and he sighed at the irony of Fate that had put such a brother in-law out of reach.

It was a sensible, but kind and affectionate letter, that reached the wilful Angela, and perhaps she wept over it a little, but reflection had only shown her more plainly the state of her heart and her course of action was decided on.

What she wrote to her brother need not be told. Suffice it that one day Alec Graham received the following from Hugh Middleton:

"My Dear Capt. Graham,—My sister is of age, and has every right to decide her life for herself. I have, as you asked me, put the case plainly before her, from her reply I gather that she intends to do as she pleases, which, as I have made it a rule never to impose my will upon hers and as I have no legal authority over her, she is quite at liberty to do.

"I have learnt at the same time that there is a good chance of your recovery by an operation, and I sincerely hope this may prove to be the case. Anyhow, I have complete confidence in my sister's judgment, and I think she knows best wherein lies her own happiness.

"You may rest assured that I shall welcome you as a brother-in-law should you have gained her love.

"Yours sincerely,

"Hugh Middleton."

This last sentence completely took away Alec's breath. He might tell her he loved her! And certainly the letter hinted at the possibility she might not refuse him. With such happiness within his grasp he could conquer any illness—nay, death itself.

An hour or two more and it was all over, he had poured out before her the love of his heart, and she had confessed her happiness was bound up in him. Together they began to talk of the future, and seriously discussed the operation.

"You are not fit for it yet," she said. "I am going to make you strong first. Never before have I thanked God that I have money. My life, my love, and it, are all to combine to make you well, and then after the operation I shall nurse you so carefully that you will soon be quite yourself again."

"My darling! It is not right that you should give so much and I only receive."

"You return it to me a thousand-fold in your love; and, besides, you will be a strong man again in a few years, and then you can do everything for me."

In a day or two her plans were made, and, as usual, she bore down all opposition.

The hospital chaplain married them quietly one day in the presence of her brother and the doctor and his family, and then together they left for the Isle of Wight.

From there she wrote letters radiant with happiness to her brother and her friends, telling of her husband's rapid improvement in health.

At the end of six months Dr. Hayward paid them a visit, and declared Alec fit to bear the journey and undergo the operation. The operation was completely successful, but for some weeks they passed through a very anxious time, though Angela never once lost hope.

It seemed to her that love would give him strength to win through. And so it turned out in the end, for he regained the use of his limbs and in a few years was able to walk about like other men.

Every one says that the perfect love and trust between them is beautiful to behold, and certainly they are completely happy.

THE LAST CONFESSION.

Confessions of a Self-made Girl

The writer of these Confessions relates in this series of articles the true story of her life, from the time when she left Cornwall, an unsophisticated but ambitious girl, until she made her name and fortune. Her name is well known to you.

[For the purposes of these Confessions I am calling myself Maud Cardew, as my real name is too well known for me to wish to make the story of my life public in this manner.]

The Principals in the Story.

MAUD CARDEW.—The self-made girl.

HON. ROBERT LESTRANGE. (Commonly known as Bobbie.) } Men who had helped her to come to London and befriended her on her arrival.

REGINALD (DI) NORTHCOTE. } Men who had helped her to come to London and befriended her on her arrival.

All Comes Right in the End.

October 27th.

Yes, Nellie Mateson did know. She guessed it that day at the garden party.

Last night she came and talked to me about it, and I shall always love her for speaking out as she did. It seems she has been waiting her opportunity for some time, but was always afraid I was not well enough, or would be offended. I have been suffering terribly from headaches, and last night, when St. Aubyn went out after sitting with me all the afternoon, I suddenly felt desperate and said to her:

"Don't let him come back. I can bear it best alone."

"Very well, dear," she said; "I will get Fred to persuade him to play billiards, and stay with you myself."

I did not open my eyes when she came back, as I wanted her to think I was asleep. I was too wretched to talk, or to listen to sympathy. I felt vaguely things could not go on as they were, and yet I felt too ill to act.

When I looked up presently, she was sitting on the low window-sill watching me with grave, questioning eyes. She came forward at once, and asked me if my head was any easier, and I was obliged to confess that it was.

"I'm so glad," she said, "because I want to talk to you," and then she seated herself close beside me.

"You know, Maud," she began; "you are not making any satisfactory progress at all, and I, for one, can't help thinking some external cause is keeping you back. I have been with you a great deal during these five weeks, and it did not take me long to discover you were not happy."

"Did I rave?" I asked anxiously.

"Yes, dear, but you need not be anxious—you did not tell any secrets. Only you are not happy, and I think I know why."

I waited for her to go on, and looking up at me with her clear eyes she said:

"You do not love St. Aubyn."

I closed my eyes and made no reply.

"If I am right, Maud," she said; "I will not let you marry him."

She paused, then ran on in a slightly strained voice:

"I have grown very fond of you since you came to stay with us here, and I am not going to let you make the mistake I made if I can help it."

I opened my eyes again, and looked at her curiously.

"I'll tell you my story, Maud, and then you'll understand. I was only a governess when I met Colonel Mateson, and I was practically engaged to a young estate-agent I had known a long time. There was nothing actually settled, because he was so poor, but we were very much in love with each other and meant to marry some day.

"Then Colonel Mateson came to stay at the house where I was governess, and fell in love with me. I would not listen to him at first for Harry's sake, but—well—I hated teaching, and in the end he talked me round.

"I had an awful struggle, because I knew I loved Harry the best—but there were the years of waiting, when I should have to teach all the time, and feel my best days slipping past. Colonel Mateson was rich, and could give me a position as well as a good home—and when you have been snubbed as a governess, you think that is worth so much more than it is."

She walked to the window, and stood looking out before she went on:

"I daresay I should have been all right if it hadn't been for Harry," she said, "because then I should have loved Colonel Mateson more, but as it was, it just made all the difference.

"I enjoyed the novelty and the freedom, and the gaiety for a year or two, and then I began to tire of it. One cannot realise beforehand how it can grow to pall. It gets so stale after a time, if there is nothing besides; unless you happen to be born with a consuming desire to dress better, and entertain better than your next-door neighbour.

"I am not like that, neither are you. I daresay you have been a little dazzled at the idea of being a duchess, but, believe me, Maud, the game isn't worth the candle if you don't love the Duke."

She looked at me strangely a moment.

"If you love someone else better," she finished; "it will probably be better that you had never been born."

I turned my eyes away to the window, and gazed fixedly on the distant mountains, and for a long time we were silent. Then she opened her heart to me still more.

"Of course, if one has a family it may make a difference," she said; "I can imagine one could easily give the best to the father of one's children. But if there are none, one needs all the more love to make up for it. I don't mind telling you, but I wouldn't own it to any one else, when I go among the tenants here, and see a mother with her first child, I don't know how to bear it. I'd be a governess again to-morrow, if I could end in marrying Harry, and being a mother."

I liked her to talk to me, so I said "Go on" faintly, and lay listening.

"It isn't much after all, is it, to be gay and fashionable, when the novelty has worn off? I remember when I was teaching, how I used to envy the Society women who came to the house. Of course, I only saw the surface then—I've seen further now, and I know what it is worth.

"You must have something more if you're going to be happy as well. And while I've been sitting here, I've thought so strongly about you not marrying the Duke if you don't love him. I know it will be horrid to tell him, but it won't be half so bad for either of you, as it may be later on if you marry."

"I don't feel equal to telling him yet," I said at last; "and he is so good to me."

"But you would like to break it off?" she asked.

"Yes," I answered; "I want to."

It was the first time I had confessed it frankly even to myself, but when I had once said it I felt easier.

"Then don't waste time, Maud," she urged. "Tell him this evening. You cannot possibly get any better while you have so much on your mind."

"I don't want to get better," I cried. "I want to die and get away from it all."

"Ah, don't talk like that," she broke in. "You are so young, and there is nothing done that cannot be undone yet. I always think it is rather poor to want to die when one has made a mistake."

"Oh, it's not just that," I ran on; "it's everything. You don't know what a failure I seem to have made of it all."

"Failure?" she echoed. "You, a failure! You are one of the most successful women of the day, and many think the most beautiful."

I lay back with closed eyes. I could not tell her how it all seemed nothing without Di. With him, but so much the more to give.

She went on talking to me, however, and in the end I promised to speak the next morning.

And to-day we had it all out together. I never want such another half hour in my life!

He took it badly—I was afraid he would—and I felt one of the most loathesome creatures on earth. Of course, I deserved it all—I know I did, and yet, I never meant to hurt him. I seem to be always causing someone pain, and yet it isn't that I don't care—I never seem to find it out until it is too late.

Well, it is over now, and he is going to his big game—Oh, I do hope he will soon forget.

January 20th.

What a strange world it is!

Here am I, taking advantage of the bright winter sunshine and a cosy nook, although it is January, actually writing my journal in the very same old keep of the ruined castle, where Bobbie and Di first found me.

Really! I can scarcely believe my own senses.

What is more Bobbie and Di are here, too, at least, close at hand, only there is a lot to relate before I get to that, and I am religiously determined to go on just where I left off.

Well, after St. Aubyn first left me I was rather worse for a time, but I soon began to pick up again, and ten days later Nellie Mateson took me up to London to see a specialist. He tried a fresh treatment altogether for my back, which proved very successful, and I am now nearly all right again.

For some time I did not see or hear anything of Di, which was not very surprising, as I learnt soon afterwards he had gone over to the West of Ireland to spend a few months on a cousin's estate, and try to help him manage his refractory tenants.

Bobbie, meanwhile, was in the South of France with his people, and I missed him very much. One day, however, he came rushing in, in his usual fashion, nearly upsetting Mrs. Mateson altogether in his haste to get to me.

"News, Queenie," he cried. "News! I've been tearing madly about London all the morning looking for you. When I found your flat locked up, I rushed out into the street and asked the first policeman I came across if he knew where Queenie was. He smiled at me indulgently, and murmured something about Colney Hatch.

"Don't tell me she is there!" I cried; "that is too much!" I flew back and asked the porter. He gave me your address, but with the wrong number. He is a fool. I wonder I haven't burst with having to keep my news so long."

"Aren't you going to say 'how d'ye do' to the pretty lady, Bobbie?" I asked him, laughing across to Nellie, who fortunately enjoyed Bobbie's eccentricities quite as much as I did.

"My dear Mrs. Mateson," he exclaimed apologetically; "I—I really didn't see you," and in another minute he was literally hugging her. "It's all this news," he ran on. "It's sizzling inside like—like—well, anything that sizzles."

"You shall have Maud all to yourself at once," Nellie laughed; "and tell her quickly, for I don't want the ceiling off my drawing-room."

The moment we were alone he came and sat on the arm of my chair, and positively gurgling with happiness exclaimed:

"By Jove, Queenie!—she's a clipper."

"Is it a lady or a horse?" I asked.

"A horse!" he repeated scathingly; "I should think not. There, what do you think of that?"—and he produced a large portrait from his breast pocket, and handed it to me.

It was a picture of a charming young girl in a sailor hat and a yachting costume, with a frank, winsome face, and a twinkle in her eyes that looked wholly irresistible. The sight of it seemed to lift an anxiety from my mind, for I had always felt afraid for Bobbie's future.

"She's perfectly charming!" I said. "Do tell me all about it?"

"She's going to be the Honourable Mrs. Robert Alexander Lestrange," he answered proudly. "And that's all that matters."

"I am delighted," I said warmly, "in fact, too glad for words."

For about an hour he entertained me with a detailed account of his courtship from the very beginning, and then broke off suddenly to speak of my affairs.

"I only heard about your engagement being off when I got to London," he said. "What did you do it for?"

"Don't talk about it, Bobbie," I said persuasively, "I've had a bad time in more ways than one, and I want to forget all about it while you are here."

"I wonder if Di knows?" he remarked unheeding.

"Of course he does. It is known all over London!"

"But he doesn't happen to be in London. He's somewhere in the wilds of Ireland, fighting tenants with shillalahs, and rotten eggs."

This was news to me, and I could not help showing my interest.

"He cancelled a lot of engagements and went off very suddenly," Bobbie continued, "and no one could imagine what had possessed him. I saw him just before he started and he said he didn't know when he should come back, but possibly not for a long time. He was jolly well down on his luck!" and Bobbie suddenly became very thoughtful.

"You look very seedy," he said presently. "I thought you would have been quite all right by now."

"So I am," I asserted. "I only want a little change to my native air, and then I shall soon be as well as ever I was in my life."

"Do you mean you are going home?" he asked incredulously.

"Yes," I told him, "I'm going to drop Miss Maud Cardew of newspaper fame, and go back to the farm as if I had never been away. I shall probably reappear about March."

"Well, I'm glad you're not going for good," he said. "You've got to help Joan and me to set up an establishment, you know. A sort of doll's house affair, with a docile cook, and a butler I dare ask to hand the bread."

The next week he brought his Joan to see me, and it is no small thing to say I was not in the least disappointed. He came again in the evening to ask me what I thought of her, and I was glad to be able to sing her praises to his heart's content.

But I was very tired and very sad, and after a time Bobbie discovered it, in spite of my efforts.

"Look here, Queenie," he said, in just his old boyish way. "Things have all gone wrong with you, somehow. What's the matter? You're got to tell me all about it."

I tried to prevaricate, but he would have none of it. He came and sat on the arm of my chair, and said:

"You've got to tell me, Queenie. I'm as good as an old married man now, and you can talk to me like a father."

His very sweetness made the tears start to my eyes, and such a lump came in my throat I could not trust myself to speak.

He played with my hair in silence for some time, and then I began again to persuade him that I was only depressed through weakness.

But he would not believe it.

"You are altogether different," he said. "And I'm going to find out what's the matter. Why, there's Di, too, with a face as long as a fiddle, quite forgetting to be sarcastic. I can't make him out any more than you.

"He says good-bye to me, and goes off to Scotland for six weeks, then turns up again in a fortnight for no apparent reason whatever. I asked him a lot of questions about you and the Duke, and he wouldn't tell me anything. Kept changing the subject at once. I never saw Di in such an odd mood before."

He got up and strolled round the room.

"Tell you what!" he exclaimed presently. "I believe he's in love with you all the time, and not Lady Danestone, only why he didn't go in and carry you off when he had the chance, I'm hanged if I know."

"Nonsense, Bobbie!" I asserted. "Di is not a marrying man. He only paid all that attention to Lady Danestone because her husband was such a great friend of his."

"I guess there's more in Di than is dreamt of in our philosophy," he remarked. "Which shows I didn't go to school for nothing," and then he stood looking at me, evidently with some new idea working in his mind.

I did not see him again before I came down here, but I have learnt since, that in the wilds of Galway, Di received the following characteristic letter:

"DEAR OLD CHAP,—Are you a blind bat, or a blithering idiot, or what? Here's his Grace shown the door, and on his way to play skittles with elephants and natives in some foul swamp, while the queen, after languishing in London for a few weeks, departs for her native air, talking of failures, and life purposes, and all that kind of stuff.

"Meanwhile you, the only man in the least likely to hold the key to the riddle, waste time breaking shillalahs over Irish tenants' heads, which don't concern you in the least.

"If you've a grain of sense, you'll take my tip and cross to-night—catch the 10.50 from Waterloo, and arrive at the farm in time to fix the day before bedtime.—Yours, BOBBIE.

"P.S.—If you've time to think of anyone else's affairs during the journey, I would suggest the fact that I am going to be married to the best girl in the world (bar one, of course) next month."

Well, Di took Bobbie's tip, and crossed to England that evening, caught the ten-fifty at Waterloo, and walked up to the farm about six o'clock.

It was a glorious moonlight evening, and I was out on the cliffs, enjoying my beloved scenery, and there he sought me.

I saw him coming in the moonlight, recognising his walk instantly, and I stood still amazed, scarcely able to believe my own senses.

Before Di reached me I knew what he had come for, and stood silently while the hour of my joy drew near. There was no need for words or explanation—he looked into my eyes and held out his hands, and I laid mine in them. Then he raised them to his lips.

What followed I have written upon "tablets of stone," and placed them in the "Holy of Holies" of memory, safe guarded for ever from the prying eyes of the world, from all defilement, and from all decay.

It was not until he got Bobbie's letter that he knew my engagement with the Duke had been broken off, and even then he felt he had no reason to suppose I should ever care for him. But he had got to that stage when action of any kind is better than waiting, so he threw caution to the winds and came to try his luck. He told me that directly he got into Cornwall he felt that I was his.

He has been staying at the farm ever since, and we are going to be married very quietly to-morrow at the little church on the cliff. Bobbie has come down to be best man, and, as he puts it, give us a fatherly blessing.

He maintains unblushingly that we owe everything to him, and that but for his marvellous insight, we should both of us have messed up our lives into the most horrible jumble imaginable. Of that I am not able to judge, but I do not in the least mind being indebted to Bobbie for everything. I am quite sure that all my life I shall only love him a little less than Di.

But, looking out over the peace of the waters this morning, I am thinking perhaps there is indeed a kindly hand in Providence, that saves us from ship-wreck in spite of ourselves, and gives us our heart's desire, however little we have deserved it.

Finally, though I shall probably be always envied by the world as the successful actress first, and Society beauty afterwards, to my own heart for evermore my proudest title will be, "Di's Wife."

THE END.

NEXT WEEK

the first instalment of our new serial story will appear. It will be written by

BLANCHE EARDLEY,

whose life story is now appearing in Pearson's Weekly in a series of articles called "Tinsel Triumphs."

The title of the new serial will be

and it will hold the attention of readers from start to finish. To prevent disappointment in not being able to get a copy of next week's Short Stories when you go for it, tell your newsagent to reserve one for you.

The Decoy.

How a Girl Broke a Bargain and Won Love.

THE room in which Frank Braund worked, and which he called his "laboratory," though it was in fact sitting-room, bed-room, kitchen and all, occupied the whole of the second floor of the premises owned by Ishmael Isaacs, pawnbroker, money-lender, and—anything you please.

Frank found the place convenient in many ways. A young inventor whose inventions will not sell is often in want of a little ready cash, and in such an emergency a friend close at hand is a convenience. Also there had, until lately, come from below never a sound to disturb his thoughts, for Isaacs himself occupied on the first floor that room that had not been turned into a storehouse for all sorts and conditions of unredeemed pledges.

Now, however, there came through the floor the sound of a violin. Frank knit his brows, and threw down his pen impatiently.

How was it possible for any man to make important calculations while that wretched instrument wailed in his ears? That evening made the fourth time within a week that his work had been disturbed. He paced the room angrily.

"It's too bad of Isaacs," he muttered. "I've been here for over a year now, and he has never found it necessary to play that thing before—why should he begin now, just when I am on the point of completing what should be a really good thing? He knows, too, that I am hard at work. Perhaps if I go down and ask him he will leave off."

Frank made for the staircase and was quickly standing outside Isaacs' door.

The playing was really not bad, in fact it was good. Strange that the Jew should not have mentioned that he was master of such a difficult instrument as the violin.

Often when Frank could not work he looked in by special invitation at his landlord's room and spent an hour or so chatting with him. The man could talk, and though he could never like him, this in Frank's eyes covered a multitude of sins, for, like many another hermit, he sometimes found his loneliness more than he could bear.

He listened a little while with his hand on the lock, for when it did not disturb his working hours, he was genuinely fond of music. Then, with a short knock, he entered.

To his intense surprise the occupant of the room was not Isaacs at all, but a tall, dark, handsome girl, apparently about twenty-two years of age.

She had stopped playing as he opened the door and stood, her violin under her chin, and the bow straight down by her side, looking at him questioningly.

"I—I beg your pardon," stammered Frank, "I thought——"

The girl smiled a friendly welcome at him.

"You must be Mr. Braund!" she cried. "Oh, I've disturbed your work! I am so sorry. I will leave off at once."

"No, no, don't do that," answered Frank. "I've done for to-night, really."

"That's not true," said the girl, laying her fiddle and bow in their case. "I am very, very sorry. I tried to play softly because my uncle told me it might disturb you."

"Your uncle?"

"Yes—Mr. Isaacs. I call him that, though we are really not related. I am his sister's step-daughter." She snapped the clasp of the violin-case with a click. "There, Mr. Braund," she cried, "I will worry you no more."

Within Frank's mind there waged a tremendous conflict. He thought of his work, then of the music and of the beautiful girl before him. Then he thought of his work again. That, however, was a long way off, upstairs, whilst the girl and the music were close at hand.

"If I stay," he asked, "will you play for me, Miss——?"

"My name is Ruth—Ruth Mabbe. I don't know if it would be right to take you from your work, you know." There was a mischievous twinkle in her eyes.

"My work can wait for to-night," said Frank. "Play, Miss Mabbe, please."

Without more ado the girl took her violin from its case again, and, giving a quick glance at the man who sat expectantly watching her, she drew her bow across the strings and began to play some sweet, simple air of Schumann.

Frank listened entranced. Whilst his ears drank in the music his eyes delighted in the graceful, swaying figure of the tall girl in front of him, the long sweep of her bowing arm, and, above all, the beautiful poise of her neck and head bent to cuddle the fiddle deliciously between her bosom and her rounded chin.

Never before in a life given to science had Frank known such pleasure, and when the music ceased he remained quite still watching the girl.

"Well?" she asked at last, returning his gaze with no fear, and yet no suggestion of boldness in her glance.

Frank rose slowly, and came towards her, holding out his hand.

"You play beautifully, beautifully, Miss Mabbe," he said. "May I come and hear you again—soon?"

"Why, yes, of course," she answered. "But you must be sure to let me know if at any time my playing annoys you."

"It will never do that," said Frank earnestly. "Good-night!"

Could Frank have looked through the door that closed behind him, he would have seen the girl dancing quickly round the room with a look of glee in her eyes.

"Caught!" she whispered joyfully. "Caught! Now we will spoil the Egyptians. I wonder what it is that my very dear uncle wants me to find out from this extremely impressionable young man." She sat down and thought.

"It must be of great importance," she continued, "or he would never have so far overcome his miserly ways as to invite me to his house. When he asked me I guessed I was to be used for some purpose, and now I find that I am to be the decoy that is to draw a secret from this poor, handsome fool. Oh, well, it will be fun!"

Ruth was not really heartless, nor was she dishonest, but she had always been brought up to consider that money should be gained in the easiest way. Her better feelings had never been educated, and so it was that she regarded her uncle's proposal that she should draw Frank into confidence, and so get at his secret, merely with amusement.

The next evening Frank found himself anxiously awaiting the sound of the playing. Directly the first tones rose to him he stopped his work and went, as he had done the night before, to the room below.

Music did not occupy all their time, for Frank found his new friend a ready listener, and was soon confiding to her his hopes and fears. He told her of his many failures and few small successes in the past, and how much depended on his new invention—an invention that would be a blessing to mankind and at the same time bring him fame and fortune.

The next night and the next, for a week, did Frank stop his experiments and calculations at the first sound of the violin, and taste the pleasures of the companionship which for so many years he had denied himself.

Though Ruth Mabbe always seemed as glad to see him as he to see her, after a while Frank, though unused to reading the moods of the opposite sex, thought he discerned a change in her.

No longer did she appear eager to listen to his talk of his work, but repeatedly tried to draw him from the subject, particularly when he spoke of the invention he was then engaged in perfecting. She was less bright and vivacious than she had been, and once he thought she looked as though she had been crying.

Then there came an evening when the music did not break in upon Frank's study. He tried to continue his work, but found it impossible, for every fibre of his body was strained and expectant of the melody which would summon him to the side of his love.

"His love!" He paced the room, thinking, thinking, thinking.

"Yes, I love her!" he cried to himself. "I, who have nothing in the wide world to offer her." He turned and gazed at the table on which stood the models of his invention. "Yet, if she loves me, she will wait a little, and these, the work of my brain and hands, should count for something."

As his eyes wandered over the many pieces of ingenious mechanism a great purpose took shape in Frank's mind. He determined to tell this girl every detail of this great secret he had guarded and cherished for so long.

She already knew a little, but she must know all—all! Love and absolute trust were all he could give her, and of these he would withhold nothing. When she knew all, he would ask for her love in exchange.

Still there came no sound from the room below, and Frank, burning to make trial of his fate, was quickly outside the door that had so often of late opened to admit him to happiness.

He knocked, and there came no answer.

He knocked again, and bent his ear closer to the panel.

Was that a sob? Yes! Swiftly Frank flung open the door, and there, full length on the couch, her face buried among the cushions, lay Ruth, sobbing as though her heart would break.

Two strides carried Frank across the room, and, kneeling by her side, he attempted to pacify her.

"Ruth, Ruth!" he cried. "What is the matter? Tell me?"

The girl raised her head, and he saw the utter misery in her eyes. Then, with a despairing gesture, she motioned him away.

"What is the matter, Ruth?" asked Frank again.

"You must go away—you must never see me any more," she moaned.

Frank could hide his love no longer. One hand stole up and caressed her hair, and the other covered her tiny hands so tightly clasped in the agony of her grief.

"Ruth, little Ruth, tell me. I love you," he pleaded.

At his words a new fear seemed to add itself to the misery in her eyes. She stared at him for what seemed an eternity. Then she whispered, so low that he could hardly catch the words—

"You—love—me?"

Frank's hand sought hers again.

"With all my heart," he said earnestly. The girl sprang to her feet.

"Ah, no, no, no!" she cried. "You must not! You must not! Go! Go away! You must never see me again?"

"Ruth——"

"No, no! You say you love me. Go, then. You do not know what this means to me."

Frank gazed perplexedly at the girl standing before him with fingers interlaced appealingly. Then he turned slowly on his heel, and went from the room.

Upstairs he tried to reason out Ruth's trouble by going over in his mind all he knew of her; but no satisfactory conclusion could he arrive at. All that was certain was that when he would have told her his love she had implored him to leave her in tones so imperative that he had no choice but to obey, though it had cost him sore.

For an hour he puzzled over her change from happiness to sorrow, and remembered many incidents that told him it had been by no means sudden.

Though she seemed like a companion of years, he had known her but a fortnight, and he was now certain that during at least a week of that time she had been fighting against the sorrow that had at last overwhelmed her.

He saw her again in his mind's eye as she had lain sobbing, and with the vision came a nearly over-mastering desire to go to her and bear her away from her unhappiness.

Downstairs he went under the influence of this desire, and it was only when his hand was on the latch of her door that remembrance of how she had besought him to leave her came to him.

Instead of entering, he turned and went out into the street.

As he walked the grief for her sorrow that had come to him first gradually gave place to a great despair because he had lost her.

"You must never see me again," she had said. Did she mean that? Yes, he could not doubt the dreadful words. Yet see her he must. This strong love so newly born in his heart could not be killed quickly. He would win her yet.

On and on he went, and plan after plan he made and discarded. He had no means of knowing the least way in which he could aid her, and his hope grew less and less as he walked Yet he remained determined.

"No matter at what sacrifice, I will gain her heart," he said at length. "Yes, even though in the gaining I abandon it—my triumph!"

Night fell, and he was still tramping. Weary and footsore he returned to his room.

There on his desk lay a long, fat, blue envelope.

"From Ruth!" he cried, and tore it open. Rapidly he scanned the note that fell out.

"Good-bye," it ran without any greeting. "I shall have gone out of your life when you read these lines. Though I could not tell you to your face, yet it is due to you to know that I am an infamous creature not worth your lightest thought. My presence in the house was a trick, and my behaviour was the carrying out of a trick, to win from you for my uncle's benefit the secret of your invention.

"From your talk I gleaned but little, but the little you did tell me has enabled me by the aid of stolen visits to your room to piece together the whole of that which you think is known to no one save yourself. If you doubt me, read the inclosed notes which, had I held to my bargain and kept faith with my uncle, would now be in his hands, and not in yours, their rightful owner.

"If you would know why I have done this thing, say it is because association with you has made me a little better than I was when we first met. Forgive me if you can, and rest assured that your secret is as safe now as ever it was. Again, good-bye."

With an exclamation of mingled horror and surprise Frank seized the sheets of notes and read through them wonderingly. Save for a few unimportant details, Ruth had indeed learnt his secret from A to Z, and the evidence was in his hands.

In his hands. Safe! It had been a narrow escape, though, and he would certainly settle with Isaacs for his villainy. Meanwhile he must find Ruth, for all he desired was that she should love him as he did her, and until he could be sure of that even the safety of his invention was as nothing to him. What did it matter that she had been the tool of a thief? She had repented, and love is very forgiving.

Somehow or other this note, so full of a girl's despair, seemed like a messenger of great hope to him.

Frank dashed downstairs. Isaacs must know where his niece had fled. He sought him in the warehouse and the shop. He was in neither place.

The cellar door stood open. There was a chance that the pawnbroker might be there, and downstairs went the seeking, impatient lover.

The cellar staircase led to a passage which ended at another door. Frank was just about to open this when he heard voices and paused.

"Will you tell?" asked a man gruffly. It was Isaacs.

There was no answer, but the listener heard a metallic click and the turning of a rusty screw.

Then came the brutal voice again.

"Will you tell now?"

Again no answer, and again the click and squeaking of the steel screw, followed this time by a low groan—a woman's groan.

With a shout Frank burst open the door.

At the far end of the dimly-lighted cellar he saw Ruth tightly bound to what appeared to be a merchant's copying press. Her thumbs were between the steel plates. By her side, holding the pressure screw, stood Isaacs.

Frank dashed at him, and, with one clean blow, sent him spinning into a corner, where he fell and lay.

Quick as thought he gave the screw a mighty twist and released the tension. Then he tenderly unbound the fainting girl and carried her to her room.

Luckily he had visited the cellar in time, and, though the pain must have been terrible, he could see that the girl had not been seriously injured by the fiend who, had he not been stopped, would doubtless have maimed her for life, or perhaps killed her in his maddened endeavour to wring from her the secret she had determined to hold.

As Frank laid her gently down he kissed her lips, and then her closed eyes. Slowly she opened them.

"My darling, my darling, why did you do this thing for me?" he cried.

"Because I love you, Frank," whispered Ruth. Then, as she felt his strong arms tighten around her, she gave a little sigh of content.

In reply to readers who have been inquiring whether the first six sentences of the competition, which appeared in Pearson's Weekly and Home Notes, are as eligible as the lists which have been published in Short Stories, I would say that it was distinctly stated at the time of their appearance that they could be used. The ninth list of sentences will be found on page 655.

This week sees the close of the "Confessions of a Self-made Girl." All who have enjoyed reading them will, I am sure, be interested to hear that Maud Cardew, after all, obtained her heart's desire—to become a duchess. Shortly after her marriage with Di his ducal relative died, and leaving no nearer kinsman than Di, the latter succeeded to the dukedom.

The first story in the series by Winifred Graham appears on page 656. Each of these stories is complete in itself, and I shall be glad to hear from readers whether they prefer a series consisting of complete stories, or one with two or three characters running through it. Send your opinion on a postcard marked "Series."

Next week our new serial will commence. As I told you in our last issue, it is from the pen of Blanche Eardley, the writer of "Tinsel Triumphs" in Pearson's Weekly. The title of the story is "THE BOND BETWEEN." The writing will be very fresh and crisp, the plot novel, and readers will be impatient to learn the movements of the characters each week.

There is sure to be a run on next Tuesday's Short Stories, so you should give your newsagent early instructions to reserve a copy for you.

Ninepence is not a very large sum to most people, but it is wonderful what a great deal it will do if sent to the Fresh Air Fund. It will pay for a whole day's outing, with plenty to eat and drink, for a city child who has no other opportunity of breathing the fresh country atmosphere. For £8 2s. a party of 200 children, together with the necessary attendants, can go away for a day.

Don't look at the list of subscriptions acknowledged in Pearson's Weekly and think that it is growing quite big enough without your help. If many other persons had the same thought it would be a bad look-out for the children Send along what you can afford now to the Hon. Sec., Fresh Air Fund, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. All amounts received will be acknowledged in Pearson's Weekly. Collecting forms will be gladly sent on application to those who prefer that method of helping along a good cause.

Cheating the Customs.

The Story of a Chivalrous Man and a Chinese Dog.

THE train looked very full, so full that at the first glance Vere Ashley despaired of finding a seat. After the manner of all Englishmen, it was an operation he liked to perform in leisurely fashion. Choosing his carriage with care, but with shrill-voiced officials screaming "En voiture, monsieur," in accents of indignant astonishment at his laggard steps, Vere had no choice but to select the first carriage that he came across, and he tumbled in headlong, in a confused mass of golf clubs, fishing rod, bag, and portmanteaux.

When his nerves had resumed their usual serenity, and his paraphernalia was disposed of in the rack, he had time to look about him. To his surprise he found that he had entered a compartment that contained only one passenger, a girl—fresh-faced, fair-haired, with an expression of almost beseeching timidity in the large, dark blue eyes that she fixed on him.

Vere returned the glance with interest; he was excessively impressionable, and the idea of this lovely girl as a companion till Calais was reached, was most welcome to him.

"A jolly sight nicer to look at that pretty face than at this rotten landscape," Vere reflected, as he unfolded his newspaper, and, seemingly absorbed in it, peeped over the edge now and again. "She's as pretty as a daisy; wonder why she looks so sad."

The girl, after glancing at him several times in furtive, nervous fashion, now retired behind a book, and Ashley grew interested in his paper. Suddenly, however, a sound smote upon his ear, that made him drop the Times in consternation. It was the sound of a sob, uttered by someone in pain; it was repeated again, and Vere looked in alarm at his companion, whose features were still hidden by the book.

"I beg your pardon," Vere said very gently, as a third sob, this time almost rising into a moan, broke the silence, "but—but what is the matter? Can I help you?"

The book fell to the floor; the girl's beautiful eyes gazed tragically into his.

"You—you won't tell?" she said in a low voice; "promise me you won't."

"Of course not," said Vere rashly, "I'll be as silent as the grave."

"Then—it's—it's not me, it's—it's—my dog!"

What matter that the grammar was faulty, and that the voice, though musical, betrayed a lack of breeding? Vere only knew that the lips that uttered the "me" were perfect, and that the soft tones had a note of pathos that was infinitely touching.

"Your dog," he said eagerly, "where is the poor little beggar? Don't hide him from me—I love 'em. Let's have it out."

And, with the prettiest of blushes, the girl produced from beneath the seat a small, string-tied hamper, unfastened it, and produced—in a state of indignant, panting, resentment—the ugliest little creature Vere could, with a clear conscience, say he had ever beheld in his life.

"It's one of the Chinese sacred dogs," said the girl with pride, hugging her treasure, who, unable to forget and forgive his imprisonment, showed a passionate desire for freedom. "Isn't he a beauty?"

Vere looked in silence at the little creature, who was the colour of castile soap, without a hair upon his body, and truthfulness struggled with the desire to please.

"He's—he's uncommon-looking," he said at length; "so he's a sacred dog, is he? I have a cousin, just back from Pekin, who declares she's got the only specimen in Europe. She'll be horribly disgusted when I tell her I met one on my travels. I was to have gone and seen her at Passy, when I was in Paris, but I had no time. What's the little beggar's name?"

"Chang," said the girl, as she stooped to place the dog beside her on the cushions; "he's a very clever little man, but, oh, I'm so frightened!"

"Why?" asked Vere almost tenderly, "of the dog?"

The fair incognita showed her pearly teeth in a lovely though fleeting smile.

"Oh, no," she answered, "but—one is not allowed to bring dogs into England, you know. There's a law against it, and—and if I'm parted from Chang, it will break my heart."

She threw her arms about the mottled object of her love, and hugged him passionately. Chang, who seemed impervious to affection, remonstrated with a fretful bark, and, wriggling away from her, trotted to the window, to look out with severe, appraising gaze upon the flat scenery.

"And what do you propose to do with him?" demanded Ashley. "You can't smuggle him in his basket through the customs, I'm afraid."

"N-no," said the girl ruefully, "but I must try. I can't stay in Calais."

"If you're found out, you'll be fined," said Vere lightly, "even imprisoned."

But he regretted his jocosity as he saw the look of terror that leapt into the lovely eyes at the last word, and the colour left the pretty face as the girl said falteringly:

"I think I should die if I had to leave Chang behind, and so would he, poor little fellow."

"Now I should have said affection was not his strong point," observed Ashley, looking at the dog who, tired of contemplating a landscape that offered so little variety, had left the window and was now facing Vere, "he doesn't seem to care for anyone but himself. He's thirsty, I think, poor little beastie, see how he's panting."

"I've some milk and water for him," said Chang's mistress, and she produced a small bottle of that refreshing liquid, and a doll's saucer; Chang drank with evident satisfaction, showed a disposition to be condescending and frolicsome with Vere when his thirst was assuaged, and then, curling himself into a tight ball, composed himself for sleep.

"He's a jolly little beggar," said Ashley, flattered, as are all true dog-lovers, by the animal's gracious advances, "and I hope most heartily you'll manage to smuggle him into England."

"If only," said the girl wistfully, "he did not hate his basket so. I had great trouble in getting him into this carriage without a guard seeing him, and I know he'll squeak on board if I take him down below, and I'm such a wretched sailor, I daren't stay on deck."

"It's very awkward," said Ashley sympathetically; "can't you hide him under your coat?"

The girl looked at him with an eager expression, opened her lips as though about to speak, hesitated for an instant, then:

"My coat isn't big enough," she said softly, "but—but yours is, and—and such lovely large pockets; Chang could get into one of them, and be quite safe and happy."

"I daresay," replied Vere rather grimly, "but should I be either? That is a question that rather interests me, I confess."

"Oh," said his companion piteously, with a break as of fast-conquering tears in her voice, "if you would only help me in this, I'd never never, forget you. I could never thank you enough. You don't know what Chang is to me; it will break my heart if I am parted from him."

Tears won the day, filling the beautiful eyes and coursing down the rounded cheeks. Some women have the power of weeping without nose and eyes becoming pink and swollen. Chang's mistress was one of these fortunate beings. Tears only enhanced her loveliness, as they glittered on her long, thick eyelashes, and Vere's heart became as wax before a glowing fire. He hated saying no to anyone, to a woman it was positive torture for him to have to utter that crushing word.

He was silent for a little while, whilst the wet blue eyes gazed at him with feverish intreaty in their soft depths. Chang, cause of the emotion, slumbered peacefully, only now and again giving strange little falsetto barks, as he disputed a dream-bone with a dream-dog.

"You'll help me?" the girl said imploringly; "oh, it seems to me as—as though you had been sent to help me."

Her little ungloved hand fluttered towards him till it found a resting-place on his arm; the touch of those clinging, slender fingers did away with Vere's small stock of prudence.

"I'll do anything you like," he said hastily, "anything—if you won't cry any more."

"Cry," said the girl joyfully, "why I could laugh, I'm so relieved and happy. You know Chang is worth a thousand pounds. I don't dread arriving at Calais as I did; here we are"—as the train steamed into the station—"quick, take up Chang, and he'll be as good as gold under your coat. He'll sleep till London, I know, for once he gets to sleep he doesn't wake for hours."

Obediently Vere took the slumbering Chang, who "snuggled" in under his coat and was soon asleep once more—and followed the girl across the platform to the gangway. Her remark as to the dog's value puzzled him; he wondered vaguely if he looked as guilty as he felt, as he slunk to the most unfrequented spot of the deck, and wished, with deepest ardour, that Dover were already reached.

He saw nothing of Chang's mistress. As the boat at last reached Albion's shores, after what seemed an eternity to Ashley, who had wondered at men's ideas of time when he heard someone saying that the passage had been accomplished in fifty minutes, he looked anxiously around for the girl, but in the crowd it was impossible to distinguish anyone, and, with the slumbering dog beneath his arm, he stepped ashore.

It seemed to him that the most perilous part of his journey was accomplished; he drew a deep breath of relief, when, with awful suddenness, Fate overtook him in the shape of a small fox-terrier, who, though having been several times pressingly requested to retire by the busy porters and officials, kept darting in and out of the crowd with cheerful persistency, and in his skipping to and fro, came into collision with Vere.

The terrier's nose told him what contraband was being smuggled into England, and instantly he set up a shrill volley of protesting barks. Chang awoke from his slumbers and answered back valiantly, thrusting his head from beneath his protecting shield. Vere stood helpless—a convicted breaker of his country's laws.

After one last wild look around for Chang's owner, he resigned himself, and followed the official who took him in charge.

"It's the matter of a fine, I suppose," he said gloomily; "and—what's to become of the dog?"

"I think," answered the man in authority, glancing curiously at Chang; "it's more than that. We had a wire from Paris early this morning, saying that a dog worth a thousand pounds, answering exactly to this description, had disappeared yesterday, and it was thought that the thief would attempt to smuggle it into London. Only—we were told to look out for a woman, as the animal is thought to have been stolen by Mrs. Percy's maid."

In all his healthy life, Vere Ashley never came so near fainting as at that instant; his head swam, he seemed to hear the official's voice as it were from a long distance, and he desperately gripped the table by which he was standing for support.

"Mrs. Percy's my cousin," he said at length, "and—and will you wire to her—saying—the dog's safe—with me—Vere Ashley. That's my name; here's my card."

"How," said the official suspiciously, "did you find the dog?"

Vere was silent. He thought of the blue eyes, the pretty smile, the appealing ways, and he determined not to betray the owner of them. True, she had deceived him, but, still——

The official repeated his question, and Vere looked at him steadily.

"I can say nothing," he said; "only—wire to Mrs. Percy, 14, Avenue Lorraine, Passy, that the dog is found and ask her to come to Dover. I'll remain in custody till then."

And thus, for the first time in his life, did the heir of the house of Ashley become acquainted with a prison cell, and had ample time to ruminate on the cunning of the female sex, till his cousin arrived, tearful, jubilant, to take her recovered treasure back to France and interrogate her cousin.

"How on earth did you find the darling?" she demanded, as they sat in Mrs. Percy's private sitting-room at the Lord Warden—Chang in his adoring mistress' arms. "I didn't know you had ever seen my maid, Preston, who stole the treasure. I suppose you recognised Chang—but how could you—you hadn't seen him?"

"I—I carried him ashore for someone," said Vere slowly, "and—he was discovered."

"Ah," said Mrs. Percy suspiciously; "well, Preston was very pretty. I am in great hopes of finding and prosecuting her. You will be able to describe her as you carried Chang for her."

"But," said Vere, steadily gazing at his cousin, "it was not Preston whom I helped—it was——"

"Well?" cried his cousin impatiently.

"A—a man," said Vere, and blue eyes seemed to smile gratefully upon him once more.

BRAND NEW COMPETITION.

Cash Down. Cash Down. Cash Down.

1st Prize, £50. 2nd Prize, £25. 3rd Prize, £10.

And 25 Gramophones.

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Below will be found six paragraphs containing the buried names of Railway Stations in the United Kingdom (or words that sound the same as the names). You must write in the spaces given the names of the Railway Stations so indicated.

No word or part of a word may be used more than once in making up the name of a Railway Station. In the event of the name of a Railway Station occurring more than once in a sentence, it should be underlined and written down each time. In case of more than one person finding the same number of words for each or any sentence, those words containing the largest number of letters will have preference. No name of a Railway Station may be composed of a single letter, either standing by itself or taken from any word in the sentences.

When you have discovered the names of Railway Stations in the sentences, underline (in ink) the words which go to make up the names (or words that sound the same as the names) and then on the line underneath each sentence write (in ink) the correct names of the Railway Stations to be found in each.

All the names will be found in the Index to Railway Stations in the January edition of Bradshaw's Guide. Should you be unable to obtain a copy of this Guide, a reprint of the Index will be sent to you for three penny stamps on application to Bradshaw's Guide, 59 Fleet Street, London, E.C.; or Room Eight, SHORT STORIES, 17 and 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

The names of the Railway Stations consist of one word or two or more consecutive words, or consecutive parts of one word, or two or more consecutive words.

The first prize of £50 will be given to the Competitor who fills in the greatest number of railway stations under the conditions stated. The second prize of £25 will go to the person who fills in the next greatest number, and the other prizes will be awarded in the order of merit.

When you have filled in all the names you can find, cut out the list below and keep it by you. Don't on any account send it to us until the closing date is announced in SHORT STORIES. The tenth list of sentences will appear next week.

In the event of a tie a further list (or, if necessary, several further lists) of sentences will be submitted to the tieing competitors until one wins the first prize outright.

The Curate's Love Affair.

Being the first of six stories told in the Brighton Express and now related

BY

WINIFRED GRAHAM.

Six men in a railway carriage—six friends.

A cold, cheerless evening, the yellow fog breathing on the window pane without, looking in like an ugly incarnation of influenza and bronchial affections.

"Business was dull to-day—everything flat," declared Mr. Carter, an elderly man with a red face.

"Yes," growled Harford, a rich stockbroker, peering through gold-rimmed pince-nez.

His tone caused Mr. Carter to smile. Harford, for one, had nothing of which to complain.

Stourbridge, a sporting man of emaciated appearance, with clear-cut features and clean-shaven lips and chin, which gave him a keen look as of a wiry greyhound, drew a pack of cards from his coat and began to shuffle them.

"What is it to be to-night?" asked Blount, a faultlessly-attired individual with a Napoleonic imperial—"poker or nap?"

Pitman, a cold-looking man in the far corner, shivered, and thrust his sealskin-gloved hands into the depths of two enormous overcoat pockets.

"Too chilly for cards," he said. "My fingers are nipped already. I couldn't stand it to-night."

Bremner, whose large, dreamy eyes were watering from the fog, placed his feet on a hot-water tin, inhaling the fumes from a gold-tipped cigarette.

"You are quite right, Pitman. It is a mistake this weather."

Mr. Carter agreed, lighting his well-coloured meerschaum; likewise Harford, the stockbroker, who handed Stourbridge one of his large cigars.

"Bremner shall give us a yarn instead," said Pitman. "We must do something to pass the time."

Bremner was celebrated for story-telling. He crossed his legs and folded his hands.

"Do you know the tale of the gipsy Miriam, a wild, unsophisticated creature, who lived in the open air chiefly, and knew not the meaning of the word 'conventionality'? No? Really? Well, it is rather odd."

He paused, and from the look in his eyes his listeners gathered that they were far away from his thoughts, which had wandered to the green lanes and rustic haunts of the gipsy Miriam.

"It was summer," he said at last, with a sigh. "My heroine is difficult to describe—you must have seen her to appreciate the strange loveliness of those sun-bronzed features. Picture a wealth of raven hair, the rich blood coursing through her cheeks; full red lips, exquisitely curved, the figure of a Trilby, unconfined by fashion's inartistic hand and barbarous incasements, eyes that would have set your soul on fire had they been lit with the light of intelligence. As it was they had more the mute appeal of a dumb animal, while her speaking voice was low and sweet enough to have made a fortune on the stage. Conjure up this personality if you can, and Miriam stands amongst us.

"Her home was a dilapidated caravan, sadly in need of a new roof and a fresh coat of paint. The lean horses that were her friends looked unkempt and weary with wayside dust.

"They were feeding on a bank of clover in a solitary spot outside the village of Rover-Ditton, while Miriam sat on the caravan steps, her long, slim hands, despeckled with brown kisses from old Sol, folded over her knees. There was a wistful, careworn look in her sad, dog-like eyes. It seemed to pierce the blue sky above, and see beyond, yet her mind was down on the earth, inside the caravan. Ignorant in the very midst of civilisation, reared by a coarse and brutal father, she lived a wandering, ignominious life.

"A man in shabby clothing, smoking a clay pipe, and lustily whistling the air of a popular street song, roused Miriam from her reverie.

"She looked down scornfully on the sordid features, pushing back her loose abundance of black hair. Then she held up a warning hand, shaking her head at her father.

"'Stop whistling,' she half hissed, through her crimson lips. 'The child seems worse—didn't I tell yer? I want her to sleep. Begone, and keep the men away. I'm watching.'

"The man gave a grunt of dissatisfaction, and continued, this time in a shriller key that jarred on Miriam, hurting her worse than a blow.

"What did he care if that frail infant lived or died?

"'You call yourself a man!' sneered Miriam, roused to indignation.

"'Well, yes, I bet I do. What do you take me for—a tumbler or a pot of gin?'

"He laughed coarsely at his own humour.

"'I believe you want her to die,' continued Miriam in a strained whisper, leaning forward with a fierce expression, her clenched fists hanging limply at her sides. 'You grudge the meat and the broth, the medicine, the milk. Bah! I believe you would rob the poor mite of her blanket if it wasn't so awful hot. But there! what is the good of talking when you're drunk? Ah! yes, I know—everybody knows—and we are not a drinking set, even Tomaso is sober half the year round.'

"The man was silent; he stared at her stupidly.

"'Who was the cove in a long black coat?' he asked at last. 'I saw you talkin' to 'im about an hour back.'

"'A clergyman,' replied Miriam, tossing her head proudly. 'I fetched the doctor, and he sent him.'

"'What do the parsons want with us?' growled the man. 'I knows 'em—a set of——'

"But something in Miriam's eyes cowed the man, and his sentence remained unfinished.

"Then, after a moment's silence, he muttered under his breath.

"'Well, see he doesn't come again.'

"Miriam glanced anxiously through the open door of the caravan, taking no notice of this remark.

"'D'you 'ear me?' questioned her father.

"'The gentleman was kind,' she replied; 'he is coming here to-night. He gave me some money.'

"'Money! How much, Miriam?'

"The man's eyes sparkled greedily, his face lit up with covetous enthusiasm; he rubbed his hands together and chuckled. He repeated the words eagerly.

"'How much?'

"'Oh, never mind; it's not for you. He thinks very badly of Betty. She has not been properly cared for, she is thin to the bone. It has all been brought on by your drink and my neglect. I wouldn't have her suffer for anything; but I thought her so strong — so hardy!'

"Tears welled into Miriam's dark eyes, but she dashed them aside hastily, as though ashamed of her emotion.

"'Go!' she cried, motioning the man away. 'You're not much credit to our encampment; and here comes the good clergyman. I'll see him alone.'

"Her father leered, and throwing a coin in the air, pointed to it insinuatingly. Then he turned on his heel, and walked away, whistling loudly.

"The sound grated horribly on Miriam's ears, as she strained them to catch a low moan from within and the feverish murmuring of the child in her sleep, as she tossed restlessly from side to side.

"Mr. Eversley, the curate, was a man of singular ideas. He had great resolution, and unlimited faith in his own capacities, without any apparent ostentation. He was eloquent and intellectual, one who would have inevitably become popular had he cared for Society and its shallow, meaningless practices. His romantic nature and love of all things strange or uncommon led him into many peculiar walks of life.

"Religion was his art, and the winning of souls his ambition; the study of human nature his amusement; mankind his pastime. The chief characters in his own little community afforded him, however, but small scope for research or zeal.

"They nearly all came to church; their wants were few, their requirements simple and easily supplied. The population being limited, he declared he knew his parishioners' bodies and souls in a day; thus it was he occasionally neglected the dull routine of district-visiting in Rover-Ditton, and sought out the inmates of the gipsy encampments. Among them the fire of genius, the inspiration of his holy calling, found a field for labour.

"Miriam was a new discovery, halting a moment in her tramp through life within reach of influence that might alter the train of her thoughts, the course of her actions.

"It just suited him, this picturesque caravan, with the wild, untutored girl. Her face was a poem, her soul a riddle, her personality bewildering in its mixture of simplicity and strength.

"She had a will to cow her sodden father, and keep him at bay when he would lay rough hands on the young child she guarded and protected. She was a creature of passion and impulse, knowing nothing of discipline, possessing an intellect as yet unawakened.

"She watched Mr. Eversley cross the broad green meadow over the way. His figure, erect and tall, stirred a thrill of admiration in Miriam's breast. His candid blue eyes awed her as he advanced; she noticed the setting sun cast a dying ray of light on his golden hair.

"'How is the child this evening?' he asked tenderly, kindly, in his mellow voice, as Miriam pushed back the door of the caravan.

"'Poor mite! how pale and wan she looks,' bending down to lay his broad, cool palm on the hot forehead. 'Are you nursing her alone? Have you no mother?'

"Miriam shook her head mournfully.

"'My mother is dead,' she replied. 'She died a month after Betty was born,' and Miriam crimsoned at the sudden remembrance of her mother's horrible death. The husband had beaten and bruised her in a fit of drunken rage, inflicting injuries from which she never recovered.

"'So you are left to tend the little one? It is a great responsibility.'

"'Yes, and I hardly know anything of children. It is real hard sometimes to do for the best.'

"The child had slumbered again as from sheer exhaustion, and Miriam crept silently out into the red light of the setting sun. Mr. Eversley followed. It was a still, calm evening.

"'You must pray to God, and He will guide you,' said the clergyman, who, doing all things from a spiritual standpoint, considered it his duty to see if this girl knew anything of Christianity.

"He might as well have broached the subject to a heathen.

"Miriam opened her lovely eyes wider, she looked him up and down in a way that might have made less self-conscious men feel awkward and uncomfortable.

She clutched his arms with both hands and stared into his eyes. "D'you mean it? Say, d'you really mean it?"

"'Oh!' she said, after a moment's hesitation; 'but, you see, we don't care about religion. Father says it's only for the gentry and such folks. I never go inside no churches. I guess there is a devil somewhere, and perhaps a God, just as we hear there's a Queen in England. It don't make any difference to us — we never see her; and if we did, she wouldn't take no notice of us, though she is in the world. And God isn't.'

"He laid his hand on her arm firmly, but not unkindly, though his lips were set, and a pained expression passed over his noble features. He pointed with outstretched fingers to the west.

"'Do you see that flood of glory—there—all red and gold and beautiful? Do you see the faint blue above it? Have you noticed the world—the trees and the flowers, that hawthorn on your right, those dog roses to your left, the buttercups at your feet? Now, who do you suppose made them all—who fashioned it? Did I? Did you?'

"'Lor', no!' laughed Miriam, as at a huge joke, showing her white teeth, while her eyes sparkled merrily. 'Oh! you are funny, sir!'

"This was the very last effect he had wished his words to have on the girl.

"'Fancy,' he thought, 'if people looked at my pulpit teachings in that light!'

"The sight of her amusement was a tragedy in itself. Here was a girl living sinfully, blindly. It was his duty to reform her.

"She read his disapproval at a glance, and turned to him appealingly, with a look of deep regret, wonderment, perplexity.

"I've said something what's wrong, something as didn't please you,' she cried, in evident distress, her smooth forehead wrinkling, her large eyes saddening.

"'It needed no miracle,' thought Dion Eversley, 'to enlighten her empty mind. She was an unbeliever—a lost sheep in the wilderness—and must be brought back—converted!'

"His imagination, quickened by the luminous resplendency of the summer evening, painted for Miriam's benefit the most vivid word picture. He brought forth before her the eternal presence of a living God, an Unseen Being of infinite mercy; whose Heaven was a land of cloudless day, where white angels dwelt, and crystal streams refreshed the traveller at last.

"Her liquid eyes drank in all he said, though sometimes the low laugh re-echoed again, and the flashing teeth were revealed in an incredulous smile.

"'It is aggravating to hear of Heaven,' Miriam exclaimed, 'when there's little or no chance of my ever getting there! What's t'other place like?'

"'It is the land of the lost,' he answered, and a strange shiver ran over her as he spoke. 'A purgatory of sharpest pain, where spirits are sadly vexed by the remembrance of past pleasure and the despair of future ease.'

"'You'll give me bad dreams to-night! Oh! 'ow father will swear when he gets there! No drink—no smoke—only pain! Ugh!'

"'You must not be alarmed. Perfect love casteth out fear, and you are going to be good.'

"'If it's only love that's wanted to make me better—oh! how I could love!'

"Her eyes sparkled with enthusiasm as she stretched out her hands towards the firmament, as though to grasp something, she knew not what.

"The last rays of scarlet illuminated her face before grey twilight reigned supreme. An artist would have fallen at her feet and kissed them; a poet would have dedicated an inspired lyric to her beauty; but the clergyman traced no copy in her seraphic expression—he only saw God!

"They were standing by the bank where the horses grazed.

"'You must come to church and learn to pray,' he said softly. 'The lowest may mingle with the greatest there.'

"'To church!' she cried disdainfully, with one of her ever-ready changes of mood that were characteristic of her. 'Do you think I would leave Betty to die while I went out to enjoy myself? No, I may be wicked, but I ain't bad enough for that; but Tomaso, he might watch her for me. Tomaso is Italian, and plays an organ. He has gone to the village now. They give him pence for the sake of his handsome face and bonny smile.'

"Mr. Eversley remembered at her words an organ man who had come to his house, and, not liking the look of the fellow, he ordered him roughly away. There was a fiendish gleam in the Italian's eyes, and something like command in the tone of his voice, loudly crying out for coppers.

"The clergyman felt deeply grieved for this wild, wayward ignoramus, with her lustrous, yet innocent eyes and sunburnt, oval face.

"He noticed her dark locks stirred by the evening breezes, as if the zephyrs lightly kissed them in passing, because they were beautiful, and she was so young, so tender. She was too lovely a daughter of Eve to spend long years in this godless manner, and being a man (very human), he felt sorry. All things to him were as dross in comparison with sanctity of heart and life. She awoke in him a sublime pity. Such a narrow gulf—a mere thread—divides right and wrong. And here she was, in the first bloom of womanhood, surrounded by temptations, with no one to guide or teach her, only rough men whose coarse tongues blasphemed.

"He shuddered for the girl's soul. 'She must be saved from this Hades,' he said to himself, as, departing, he left Miriam with a silver coin glistening in her hand.

"He meditated long and seriously upon the subject in the solitude of his study, and prayed for that frail craft on the seas of Life while Miriam slept in her caravan by the wayside hedge.

"Day by day the good man came, and she greeted him with gladness, till he told himself, after long converse and exhortation, he had opened the flood-gates of light—she was indeed developing into a Christian.

"It was odd to hear those lips that reviled outside the caravan, and defiled themselves with language picked up from her father, pleading in prayer a moment later over the bedside of the ailing child.

"Mr. Eversley's constant visits were remarked upon by various members of the congregation, for in Rover-Ditton his every movement was chronicled from house to house by the cackling tongues of village gossips.

"At first Mr. Eversley wondered why he went so frequently, and found it pleasant.

"'Miriam's little sister is ill,' he told himself; 'it is only right that I should go. Miriam is ignorant of divine truths; I am guiding her to grace.'

"But it was not till he believed that she had grasped the faith, and that the child had passed from the jaws of death to healthful life, that he dared confess the truth, even to himself.

"Miriam's extraordinary beauty robbed him of his senses. He had found in the lowly maid the goddess of his dreams.

"'She is an angel of loveliness,' he cried to the silent walls as he paced his study feverishly. 'Her very innocence is her charm.'

"If it was difficult to acknowledge his devotion even to himself, how far harder to declare it to the world!

"Had his secret already been whispered abroad, hinted by unguarded tongues, rumoured among his friends, to be scoffed at and derided? Did Miriam, with woman's instinct, guess it, too?

"Already he was attempting the work of moulding her character and fashioning it to his own. Yet those fatal words, which in his soul he most despised, rose to ring in his ears against his will

"'What will the world say?'

"Even the bells that chimed for service repeated them incessantly; they were holding him back from Miriam, forcing her from his grasp. Why should they make a coward of him? Why should he be ashamed? And yet—and yet he was.

"Surely the Divine Power above that rules all human hearts had destined him to love for some purpose!

"'What God has created,' he cried, while his voice thrilled with triumph, 'let not men call common or unclean.'

"The inward struggle and natural pride, the shrinking from contempt and ridicule had lasted for a while, and the supercilious curl of the world's lip threatened to wither his passion. But eventually the yearnings of his heart crushed that terror. 'Public opinion' urged him to face it boldly, and Dion Eversley became proud of his choice for its very daring.

"He would make the girl his wife at any cost. Uncultured, unrefined, reared like a wild flower by the roadside, yet to him more precious than the sweetest hothouse bloom.

"'She has fallen upon stony places,' he told himself. 'I will transplant her into an atmosphere of love and holiness. I will snatch this pure being in the innocency of her youth from a den of iniquity, and bear her unscathed from the jaws of sin.'

"His decision once made, Dion sought Miriam, his whole being on fire with the light of a great love, which enthralled and mastered him.

"He found her alone, beautiful and smiling as ever, stretched on the mossy grass like a tired child, carelessly plucking the daisies and clover. From the latter she sucked the honey. Her attitude was all idleness, for she knew not how to be diligent.

"To her lover she was an exquisite picture, the embodiment of all that was graceful and feminine. She had twined a wreath of green leaves and wild flowers playfully in her dark locks, perhaps with some natural instinct to enhance her comeliness, of which she must have been aware had she eyes in her head and ever so small a cracked mirror in the caravan. It would be a sorry and glum world but for these harmless little vanities. The spirit of the Beautiful predominates in poor humanity, raising it at times to the most elevating ecstasy.

"Dion Eversley contemplated Miriam with throbbing pulses and palpitating heart. She snatched at a butterfly as it fluttered past, bruising its fragile wings.

"The rich, sweet fulness of her voice rang out upon the air:

"'Betty, come here, I have caught you something.'

"'Don't call Betty,' he said advancing, and somewhat slyly taking her hand. 'Let it live. We have something better to think about than butterflies.'

"'I suppose you mean my soul,' she cried, looking daringly into his eyes with one of her merriest smiles.

"Something made her pause; it almost took her breath away; while a flush dyed her cheek and neck scarlet as the crimson handkerchief which formed her collar.

"'No, Miriam, dear. To-day I want to talk about your heart. I have taught you many things, and you have listened patiently—gladly. But there is something not gained through learning, but obtained of God. It is sweeter to the taste than honey; it enriches the mind; it is blessed—sublime! Can you tell me what it is?'

"She ceased to pluck the wild honeysuckle in the hedge, her eyes became awe-struck and wistful.

"'Love?' she answered faintly.

"'Yes, Miriam. The greatest thing in the world—love!'

"As he spoke he smoothed back the tossed locks, imprinting a kiss on her forehead, and the kiss finally travelled down till it lost itself in the rosy curves of full sweet lips.

"'Will you be mine—mine for always, darling?" he whispered tenderly.

"The air seemed to grow hot and heavy, the soft wind no longer murmured through the trees, her voice was choked by agitation.

"She clutched his arms with both hands, and stared into his eyes.

"'D'you mean it? Say, d'you really mean it?'

"No words were needed in reply, as he laid her soft cheek against his own, and gathered her to his breast. She remained there passive, on that sweet resting-place—content. A wonderful revelation had come to her. The wild gipsy life was to end, with its hunger and thirst, its dark hours and hardships. The weary traveller was to pass her days in the enjoyment of peace.

"'I am going to ask you, Miriam,' he said slowly, a slight tremble in his voice, 'something you must consider seriously before answering. Being mine means leaving home, friends, your present pursuits and pleasures. The old life must end, and a fresh one commence in a new world. It means a sacrifice for us both—the severing of old ties, old associations. I adore you heart and soul; love will compensate for all I leave. We will go to India together, where I have an opening for work with a mission, and you will grow to help me.'

"'What is India?' she asked simply. 'Is it a place near here where the heathens live?'

"He smiled at her lack of knowledge.

"'I will teach you all that,' he said. 'It is far, far away.'

"'Of course, I might have known. We'll have to get clear of this place. But must I leave all?"

"A yearning look of supplication crept into her eyes. For a moment she surveyed the caravan in silence, standing in an attitude of unconscious grace. An overwhelming tide of hot colour rushed into her face. Then she shook off the momentary depression. Dion waited for her to speak; she turned to him, but words failed. Suddenly, and for no apparent reason, the girl burst into a fit of uncontrollable merriment.

"The echoes resounded with her hilarity. It was a strange, wild excitement.

"'Oh, it's well,' she cried, 'yes, it's well to be loved by the likes o' you!'

"He soothed her fondly. In a moment she became quiet and grave again.

"With quivering lips she repeated the question: 'Must I leave all?"

"'I am afraid, yes.'

"'Oh! but I cannot—I cannot! Won't you let Betty come too? She'll die without me.'

"Dion Eversley had forgotten the child. He was touched by this token of sisterly affection.

"'Will her father let her come with us?' he asked.

"'Lor' bless you, he cares no more for her than for me. You don't know him!'

"'Then we will take poor little Betty, and I will be a father to her, dear.'

"She rewarded him by a quick look of gratitude.

"'When shall we go?' she asked impetuously.

"'The sooner the better; but first we must get the consent of the child's father.'

"An expression of scorn passed over Miriam's features.

"'He will not trouble you,' she replied lightly. 'When Tomaso finds he has lost me, he'll be right glad to be rid of the little 'un too. You've nothing to fear from my husband.'

"As she spoke Dion Eversley's face fell. It was a terrible and ghastly change. The truth dawned upon him in all its hideous reality.

"Miriam had misinterpreted his intentions; he had misunderstood her.

"Something seemed to swell in his throat, half choking a sudden exclamation:

"'Your husband!'

"The tone of his voice, the look on his face, made her eyes swim, her temples throb.

"'Don't turn from me!' she intreated, seizing his hand, and pressing a burning kiss upon it. 'What have I said?'

"He tried to answer, but failed, the shock of this discovery rendering him stunned and speechless.

"Seeing Dion so altered, Miriam fell upon her knees, clenching her hands convulsively together as if in pain, and stifling an agonised sob.

"The gipsy's restless, tempest-tossed heart stood still in terror. Had it lost its prize? Yes. Dion Eversley went to India—alone!"

Bremner paused, the train was steaming into Brighton station.

"I've just hit it off," he said; "that is the end."

"It couldn't be anything else," said Stourbridge. "Poor fellow! I hope it is not true!"

"But it is," said Bremner.

LOVE'S CROSS-EXAMINATION.

Telling of a Declaration in the Court of Justice.

Mr. Charles Wallis, the rising "junior," walked pensively along Dr. Johnson's Buildings, Temple, till he came to No. 3. He entered, stepping up the stone stairs rather more briskly, and opened a door on the first floor.

This suite of rooms formed his chambers, but he shared them with others. He passed through to his own particular room and threw himself into a comfortable armchair with a sigh of weariness.

"I suppose I shall have to sport chambers entirely on my own if I get on as I appear to have been getting on during the past few months," he soliloquised. His tone was moody—for he had uttered the words half-aloud, and not at all like those of a man who is making a name. "However, that need not be yet, and I may have a drop shortly! But suppose I succeed? Of what use is success to a man when that success will not enable him to get what he wants?"

He glared at a pile of papers on his table and felt like pitching them on the floor.

"I may fairly say that I have earned success," he went on. "I have plodded and tried, but it is a big task to get your chance. My chance has come at last, but it's too late. It ought to have come eighteen months ago; then it would have helped me to win Marjorie Renton! Now she is gone, and I cannot enjoy my good fortune by myself and I don't want any other woman!"

There was no mistaking the emphasis with which the last remark was made; it indicated that Wallis had been wholly in love with the girl, and that his love was of that kind which endures, despite the fact that the object of the affection is removed.

The clerk who attended to the three barristers sharing these chambers entered at that moment to report, and while Wallis listened to what the young fellow had to say his thoughts were wandering and he only half understood.

Charles Wallis and Marjorie Renton had been playmates and schoolfellows together away in the home in the north country. At the age of seventeen and fifteen respectively their paths had separated, and Mr. Renton had forbidden any correspondence. He could see what was happening, and he was anxious that his daughter should not tie herself to anyone till she was old enough to know better what she was doing. Further, he wanted a son-in-law whose means were adequate, and that was not the case with Wallis.

"My daughter has been brought up in a certain style. She will want to continue in that style. Wallis can't do it unless he makes some sort of a name or position for himself during the next few years. So, no engagement!" That was the terse way in which Mr. Renton put it.

Charles Wallis was sufficiently well-to-do to enable him to study for the Bar, but he was not possessed of sufficient means to satisfy Mr. Renton; so the old intimacy was interrupted and Wallis set to work to study, first generally, and then specially, and so the years passed away. Wallis' affection for Marjorie increased rather than diminished, and he hoped and believed that it was so with her.

He was called to the Bar, and then came the heartbreaking period of waiting for a brief. It was in the midst of this waiting time that the blow came.

Accepting an invitation from a friend, he met Marjorie, and straightway fell more violently in love than ever. It seemed to him that he had hitherto only been dreaming that he loved this enchanting girl, and that he awoke to the reality.

He saw her courted by all, and a feverish excitement took possession of him. He might lose her if he did not make some move, so he took every opportunity of meeting her and he told her of his love.

Marjorie smiled sympathetically, but there was a commiserating expression on her lovely face which struck a chill in his heart.

"I am afraid it is no use talking like that, Char—Mr. Wallis!" she said lightly. "I have been brought up in luxury, and I should not be happy; that is, I should be an unsuitable wife for a poor man. I am sorry, but——"

He interrupted her vehemently; he never remembered exactly what he said—it was something about love being better than all else, and about his making progress one day in his profession. He remembered well enough, however, the look which she gave him, and that she turned from him with a haughty gesture and left him.

Marjorie Renton had altered; her father's constant preaching about the value of money had warped her mind till she had placed that above all things. She would marry for money, even at the sacrifice of love. Those were the thoughts that ran through Wallis' mind, yet his love for her endured.

"In her own self she is good; this is a veneer which her father has laid upon her true nature!" he had said to himself. "She is lost to me and I fear that she will not be happy in a marriage of that kind, but I shall continue to love the real Marjorie Renton!"

Then he lost sight of her entirely. Mr. Renton, he heard, had sold his estate and gone abroad with his daughter, who was engaged to a wealthy somebody. Thus she was lost to him.

Wallis came back to himself with a start, to find the clerk gone and the packets of papers still on his table. He drew his chair nearer and prepared to study them.

"What did he say?" Wallis asked himself. "Oh, yes Owen and Roberts have sent me a retainer for the plaintiff in—— By Jove! a breach of promise case! Clements v. Barton. The plaintiff is a man, and he sues the girl; rather less common that Woman v. Man!

"Perhaps he has heard that I was thrown over and thinks that I can take up his case with more feeling! Nonsense! Yet why should Owen and Roberts specially retain me? They have never so honoured me, and Jackson is their favourite junior!"

Wallis did not spend much time in speculating; he would have the brief in due time.

He settled down to the work in front of him and forgot Clements v. Barton; but he could not help thinking about it when he had leisure to reflect. Two days later he learnt that he was to conduct the case; there would be no senior counsel, and, as he would doubtless have a bigwig against him, here was another chance for him!

The case promised to be a good one, with plenty of scope for Wallis, and the juniors who shared the chambers with him were envious.

"You're a lucky beggar, Wallis!" declared one. "It would have been better for you if you had been championing the lady, as in that event she would certainly fall in love with you and marry you!"

"Perhaps she will do that all the same!" growled the other. "It would be just his luck!"

"Get out of this!" cried Wallis irritably. Their envious banter jarred upon his nerves; they did not know his past.

There did not seem to be very much in the case when Wallis came to take it up, but the opportunity it afforded him consisted chiefly in the fact that he would have a good case in opposition to a noted counsel.

Miss Barton was a young woman acting as companion to a wealthy lady. A visitor to the house was Mr. Clements, a middle-aged man of means; he was attracted by the beautiful and charming companion, fell in love with her, and made a proposal, which, as plaintiff alleged, was accepted.

The engagement was to be kept secret for a time, as Miss Barton had agreed to stay with the family for a certain period and did not care to break faith.

Mr. Clements said that the defendant was fond of money, and although she was in love with him, he felt positive of it, yet it must have been really his money that she wanted. This was proved by the fact, which he had since heard, that she was coming into a large sum.

Her coolness towards him coincided with the time when she heard of her good fortune. Plaintiff was heartbroken, and asked for £5,000 damages, more as a punishment for Miss Barton than as a solatium for his own outraged feelings.

It was with these instructions that Wallis went into court on the day of the trial and prepared to open the case for his client. He had not seen Mr. Clements before that time; the plaintiff was a man of rather striking appearance—such a man as might captivate a young and inexperienced woman—but Wallis did not like the face.

It seemed to the barrister that there was cunning in it; other people might not notice it, or be less quick to detect it, but Wallis was a student of human nature.

A sort of fellow-feeling had actuated him till then; this man had been trifled with, as he himself had been, and he would fight his case with all the ability of which he was capable. Now, however, Wallis felt a change of sentiment; he did not like the man and—well, it was not Marjorie's fault that she had thrown him, the briefless barrister, over for a richer man!

"I shall do my best as a point of honour," murmured Wallis, "but I haven't the same heart in it!"

Wallis glanced about for the defendant, but he could not get a good look at her. He fixed upon a woman with a veiled face, who was half-turned from his direction. It was a cold day, the court was chilly, she was rather muffled up.

He opened his side with becoming eloquence, drawing a moving picture of the plaintiff's affection, his joy on being accepted and his grief at being jilted. In spite of himself, Wallis warmed to the work.

He looked defiantly, sternly, in the direction of the defendant—he was sure it was she—as he spoke of Clements having been heartlessly thrown over, about his feelings having been trifled with, and so on. His opening speech won the hearts of the jurymen, and it was with considerable satisfaction that he called the plaintiff and examined him.

When the opposite counsel took the plaintiff in hand for cross-examination the affair began to assume a different complexion. Clements found himself cornered with some awkward questions, for which neither he nor Wallis, especially the latter, was prepared. When that cross-examination was finished, it appeared pretty evident that Clements was an artful individual.

According to the questions and suggestions of the defendant's counsel, Clements was aware that Miss Barton possessed certain shares in a mine which had been regarded as valueless.

Clements learnt that the mine was proving itself to be a good one, and that the shares were likely to be worth a considerable sum; the information was secret—known only to a few "in the swim," like himself—and he determined to marry Miss Barton and gain possession of the scrip.

He haunted Miss Barton against her desire, but she could not get rid of his unwelcome attentions. The supposed proposal and acceptance were a plot. Mr. Clements pressed Miss Barton to marry him, and, on her refusing, he threatened to circulate various falsehoods concerning her.

Finally he brought this action against her; his object was to get money. He thought that she would pay a large sum rather than be dragged into publicity.

If she allowed the case to go to court Clements thought that he would get heavy damages. In short, he would gain money anyhow. As a matter of fact, instead of being a man of means, Clements was an adventurer.

Wallis' re-examination of his client, for the purpose of rehabilitating his character, was not successful. Two other witnesses for the plaintiff were pulled to pieces, and Wallis began to feel annoyed at having had this case handed over to him. Still, he had the chance of heckling the witnesses for the other side.

The defendant's case was opened with ability and assurance by her counsel, but the thunderbolt came when he explained that Barton was an assumed name. Wallis turned his face in the direction of the defendant, and saw that she had taken off her veil. It was just at that moment that her counsel said, "Her real name is Renton, Miss Marjorie Renton!"

With a face as white as death Wallis stared at his lost love, and she dropped her eyes before his gaze. He heard his "learned brother" telling the court how Mr. Renton had failed, and how Miss Renton's ultra-sensitive nature had prompted her, on the death of her father, soon after his failure, to take her mother's maiden name and take up a position as companion in England, her father having died abroad.

The shares were a parcel held by her father; they had not been disposed of for the simple reason that they were considered worse than worthless, as there was always a possibility of "reconstruction" with a call for further capital.

Wallis saw Marjorie rise as she was called by her counsel for examination. He aroused himself to listen to her evidence, but he was convinced that she was speaking the truth. It was his Marjorie, his playmate of old, yet with more grace and her character refined of its dross by the fire of sorrow and adversity.

It was his duty to cross-examine, and he arose unsteadily. He looked her clearly in the eyes, and he saw a frightened expression come into hers. Poor Marjorie! She thought that he would vent his own spite upon her, tearing open the past, revealing her love of money, and her readiness—apparent or real—to sacrifice herself for money. This was a great point in the plaintiff's case.

"Why did you adopt another name?" he asked. He made the inquiry more for his own satisfaction than in the interests of his client.

She looked at him sharply, defiantly; she believed herself in the hands of a man who would use his previous knowledge against her, and revel in the opportunity of humiliating her, if he could, but the look in his eyes sent a strange thrill through her. The defiant expression slowly disappeared, as she replied:

"Pride made me do it! I did not care for my old friends to know that I had become poor."

"You maintain that the plaintiff knew your identity all through—what grounds have you for that opinion?"

"I dropped an old letter addressed to me by my own name, almost the first time I saw him, and I believe he caught sight of the name. In fact, he tried to threaten me vaguely with deception, although he said nothing definite about my identity at any time."

"Is it not a fact," continued Wallis, obeying the dictates of his heart, "that you expressed preference for money rather than love?"

A spasm shook the frame of the defendant. Wallis interjected, with unlawyer-like haste:

"I have no wish to hurt your feelings, Miss Renton!"

"Wallis is ill!" declared a barrister at the table in a whisper to a learned friend. "He is going all to pieces on this case; he began so well, too!"

"I did feel so at one time," responded Marjorie Renton calmly, "but that was long ago, and I have learnt wisdom since then!"

She gazed steadfastly at him as she made this answer, and then her eyes dropped. He understood; it was a penitent confession, intended for him. She had boldly avowed her fault, so that he might believe her, and then humiliation and repentance made her lower her eyes and avoid his ardent look. The crowded court watched and listened with the keenest interest, but the inner meaning of it was lost to them.

"By whom was that old letter written?" asked Wallis, suddenly reverting to a previous reply. It was an inexplicable impulse.

"By an old schoolfellow!"

She shot a glance at him, a timid, appealing glance, and he knew who was meant. She had kept one of his old letters, and had re-read it not so long ago! Had she really discovered that she loved him, after all? He must know it!

"Then I understand that you did not care for the plaintiff, that you never gave him the least encouragement—to put it quite plainly, your affections were centred on someone else?"

He tried to speak calmly, but there was an undertone of pleading in his voice. He was asking the old, old question between man and woman, and asking it under strange, unique conditions. It was love's cross-examination; he waited breathlessly for her reply.

He forgot that she might hesitate to answer, that it was a crucial position for his beloved to be placed in; he thought only of his love, and the possibility of attaining the object of his ardent desires.

"That is all quite true!" declared Marjorie in a tone so low that the judge and jury could scarcely catch it. Just for a brief space she lifted her eyes.

Wallis was exultant; he had no further questions to ask Miss Barton or Renton. It was a marvel that he did not say something which would have benefited the counsel for the defendant rather than the advocate of the plaintiff's cause. He was brought to a sense of his doings by the solicitor acting for Mr. Clements, who during Wallis' cross-examination of the defendant, had been wondering what possessed him to conduct himself in such an extraordinary manner.

"Mr. Clements will go into the witness-box again and contradict some of those statements. Mr. Wallis! I think—er—you are not well — or something! Bother it, man!" he added, still in a whisper, but showing his annoyance very plainly, "you've made a hash of that!"

In any other circumstances Wallis would have retorted angrily at being spoken to in that manner, but he was conscious that there was some truth in it. Nevertheless, he replied with some spirit:

"Clements is a rascal, Mr. Roberts, and I wasn't well informed! I will call him again, but it will result in his getting it hotter than he did before! You say that he requested that I should be briefed for him, and I see why, now!" To himself he said, "He thought I should work against her for revenge; he has got hold of some of the past! Shall I throw the case up?"

Before he could decide on this point he had to listen to other evidence on Marjorie's behalf. He was able to cross-examine the next witnesses with some show of interest; their testimony was not of great importance, but he did his best to bring out the truth, regardless whether it aided Clements or not.

It was with something akin to relief that he heard the foreman of the jury say that they had heard enough. They considered that the plaintiff's case had signally failed, and they wished to return a verdict for the defendant.

The judge decisively concurred, and the plaintiff was mulcted in costs. The case was over.

Wallis went straight back to his chambers. It was likely enough that this case had damaged his reputation to some extent, but he cared little for that.

He was convinced that Marjorie Renton loved him; the scales had fallen from her eyes, and she knew that her heart had been reached by the devoted and enduring love of her old playmate.

As for his reputation, he would make all the circumstances known if need be! He had, perhaps, not done his duty by his client, but that client had tricked him into an action against the girl he loved.

A knock at the door was answered by Wallis himself, as the clerk and his partners were all out. Clements pushed his way in, and shut the door behind him.

"You ruined my case!" he shouted, "and I'll ruin you! I'll make it known that you accepted a brief for me, intending to help her all the time, and——"

In a twinkling the door was open and Clements felt himself gripped by the throat.

"You cur!" cried Wallis furiously. "You tricked me, and I'll throw you into the street!" There was a scuffle.

Three or four barristers, ascending the steps, crouched against the wall as two figures half tumbled down the steps, and then Clements shot from the last of the flight clean into the open, coming to rest on his back.

Certain facts leaked out which saved Wallis' reputation, but while his salvation was being worked out in that direction he was seeking happiness in another.

Finding out Marjorie's address from the solicitors who had been conducting her case, Wallis lost no time in paying her a visit. He was received with open arms and no mention was made of their previous parting.

After talking over old times Wallis put the question which he had for so long desired to put.

"Then you do love me, Marjorie?"

"Yes, Charlie!"

Then, with a happy laugh, "Didn't I tell you so in open court? Oh, Charlie, it was too bad—almost!"

"So it was, sweet, but, you see, I couldn't wait!"

HELD APART.

The Story of a Strange Double Fraud and its Influence upon some Young Hearts, a Great Name, and a Famous Fortune.

By R. NORMAN SILVER, author of "The Golden Dwarf," "The Daughter of Mystery," etc.

TWENTY-EIGHTH CHAPTER.

"This is Very Important."

THE detective regarded the war-correspondent inquiringly. Paul Jerome had drawn himself up with a curious military stiffness and his brown features had set ominously.

"Mr. Ussher," he said, "half an hour ago I told you that this man Hartigan was a scoundrel. You asked me for proof, and I doubted whether I could furnish you with what would be considered such. After what we have just learnt, however, I cannot accept the responsibility of deciding upon the point—I fear I have already held my hand too long."

The knot of fishermen about the ex-steward gazed open-mouthed at the speaker. Dennis Hartigan ceased to lean upon them in affected fatigue, and met Paul Jerome's glance with a stare of alarmed ferocity.

"It is known to all of you," pursued the war-correspondent, directing himself to the whole of his auditory, "that on the night he was found stabbed John Davenal had gone out alone with this man. It may not be known to you that, also while out alone with him, his own sister, the blind girl Kit, had a narrow escape from being killed on the level-crossing. Thanks to a good horse, I was able to save her. My opinion at the time was that her brother's conduct could only be that either of a wilful murderer or a despicable coward."

A murmur ran through the listeners and some of them drew away from the ex-steward.

"You are aware, in any case," said Paul Jerome, "that for a time he was suspected in connection with the death of his wife, Lady Tarleton's maid, to whom for years he had been secretly married, and who, of course, was John Davenal's sister. Now, it seems, he goes out in a small boat, and though he is accustomed to the sea and a native of Groudle into the bargain, he upsets the boat in a current and the poor girl is drowned."

The war-correspondent turned to the detective.

"Mr. Ussher," he added, "I told you this fellow was a scoundrel, because, with my own eyes, I had seen him deliberately abandon his blind sister to be killed by an express that, at the minute, was a hundred yards off.

"In the light of his repeated connection with other accidents and violent deaths, I can conceive of but one alternative explanation, that he is a homicidal maniac. Whatever may be the explanation, these coincidences demand investigation, and I refuse to remain passive any longer."

Mr. Ussher stood irresolute. The landlord of the Half Brick had pressed forward, and together with his buxom partner, a potboy, and a maid or two, was paying an absorbed attention.

The fishermen, with Dennis Hartigan in their midst, were evidently awaiting some hint of the detective's attitude towards the dramatic issue raised by Paul Jerome. Irene Tarleton, attracted to the general centre of interest, was moving slowly out of the small sitting-room into the bar.

"Excuse me, sir," said Mr. Ussher, directing himself to the war-correspondent, and drawing meanwhile a surreptitious step nearer the ex-steward, "but do I understand that you accuse this—that you make a definite charge against Hartigan?"

Paul Jerome shrugged his shoulders.

"A private citizen, my dear Ussher," he answered, "does not prosecute in a murder case. That is the duty of the authorities. I content myself with pointing out to you that for the fourth time in a few weeks this fellow is intimately associated with a fatality or threatened fatality to some member of the Davenal family or household. I suppose you don't deny the singularity of the fact."

The detective shook his head and checked his stealthy progress towards the ex-steward.

"I'm afraid, Mr. Jerome," he said, "that I should scarcely be justified in acting as you suggest. Coincidence plays strange tricks; we professionals know that but too well."

Dennis Hartigan smothered a sigh of relief. His lowering, anxious countenance grew viciously insolent, and, elbowing his "rescuers" aside, he came close to the war-correspondent.

"Look here, my blooming amateur," he snarled, "I tumbled to your tricks a while back—I knew you were spying on me for your own purposes. Do you see what you've been doing? Bringing yourself within reach of the law against criminal libel; that's what you've been doing.

"Do you think I'm going to sit still and let you go about playing old Harry with my character? Not me! If Mr. Ussher—who's a clever man and a great London detective—says I've done nothing wrong, that's enough for a thousand pounds damages against you, my beauty."

The war-correspondent folded his arms and his eyes met steadily those of the ex-steward.

"Bring your action," he replied. "I will give Mr. Ussher the address of my solicitors, and you can have all the fight you want. I believe you to be a dangerous and hypocritical scoundrel, and I am willing to back my opinion. The result may help me to understand why this same Moira Davenal, dressed as a diver, should have been seen in an open boat off Groudle breakwater, two or three days ago at twilight."

The shot was a chance one—although the recollection of the strange event to which he had alluded had haunted Paul Jerome with remarkable obstinacy—but it produced a distinct effect upon Hartigan. He paled, and the bullying expression in his vulgar, bloated visage wavered slightly. Certain of the spectators exchanged glances. The ex-steward perceived it and altered his tactics.

"Oh, I've no time to waste on you and your crack-brained notions," he said, "I've barely enough got off with my own life, and it wasn't for want of a helping hand that Moira Davenal lost hers. But she turned silly with fright, and fought me like a tigress. I had to loose her or sink with her."

A little cry interrupted him. Irene Tarleton, standing doubtfully on the fringe of the group, had caught the full meaning of his words. The war-correspondent spun round; he had momentarily forgotten her. She was white and tremulous.

"A thousand pardons," he exclaimed, "I did not realise that you were waiting." She put a hand on his arm.

"How terrible!" she gasped in a whisper. "Moira Davenal drowned! Oh, what—what will Guy do?"

She saw Paul Jerome's bewilderment.

"He—Guy loved her," she added, in the same low, shaking tones; "they were secretly engaged, I think. I only guessed about it the other day. This—this will kill him!"

The war-correspondent drew a deep breath; the situation had gained a new and tragic complication. "I—I wish I had known," he murmured, "it might have saved this."

He bit his lip and passed his hand over his forehead—his brain was in a whirl. The detective came up and spoke to him quietly—the bar was clearing of its occupants.

Mr. Ussher had motioned to the ex-steward, and Dennis Hartigan had vanished without reluctance into the adjoining bar-parlour. Some of the fishermen who had escorted him to the Half Brick entered with him, some hung back.

"Mr. Jerome, sir," observed the detective, with a half-respectful familiarity and touching the brim of his hat by way of a further salutation to Irene; "you made a mistake then. Why not have said all that to me privately, and left me to act?"

The war-correspondent ground his teeth.

"Because you wouldn't have acted, Ussher," he declared; "because I have remained inactive too long already. But enough of this for the present; I have to see Miss Tarleton home. If you will call at the Tower shortly, I will do as I promised regarding the other matter."

Mr. Ussher bowed.

"I am obliged, sir," he said, and with a second salutation to Irene, retreated into the bar-parlour.

The war-correspondent paid the bill for their tea, and ordered the horses.

When they were riding away from the Half Brick—Paul Jerome had mounted the groom's horse and dispatched that functionary home on foot—he drew near to Irene and bent to look ardently into her face.

"My darling," he told her, "I am little better than a bungler. I have been flattering myself upon taking my time in stalking my game, and all the while I have been making this tragedy possible. If I had only accused Hartigan openly of attempting to get the girl Kit killed by that express!"

"Kit!" said Irene, "the little blind girl whom you rescued. But it could not—it could not have been more than an accident."

The war-correspondent's fingers tightened on his rein.

"I saw him," he replied, "stop her upon the level-crossing, walk forward, and pass through the gates, leaving her directly in the path of the train. It was all horribly, diabolically deliberate!"

Irene shivered; Jerome went on with a grim reflectiveness.

"Hartigan pleaded," said the war-correspondent, "that he had lost his nerve, and was prematurely alarmed by the approaching train. But he bore none of the marks of fear, and his anger against me was only too apparent. Some instinct warned me that I had averted a crime. If I had accused him openly it might have prevented this last fatality. Single coincidences are frequently the work of chance, double coincidences are more often the result of a common cause. A genuinely accidental fourfold coincidence is impossible."

"A fourfold coincidence," repeated Irene.

"Fourfold and ghastly," said Jerome; "and its significance is unmistakable. Hartigan has drowned Moira Davenal as he stabbed her father, as he tried to kill his sister, as conceivably, in spite of all that appears to the contrary, he murdered, or was party to the murder of his wife.

"The man is either a calculating fiend with motives to be explained by some fact as yet hidden from us, or he is a homicidal maniac. The murder of his niece shall be the last, as it is the worst of his crimes. I can only hope that you are wrong about Vanbrugh loving the poor girl."

Irene's head drooped.

"We must not deceive ourselves," she answered; "I know Guy well—we have been playmates and companions since childhood. I read his secret as soon as he mentioned her name. He wished me to make friends with her; he praised her to me as a man only praises one woman, the woman he is in love with."

Paul Jerome sighed profoundly.

"Poor—poor fellow!" he exclaimed, and he brought his horse so near to her hack that he could touch her hand that held the reins.

In presence of the shadow that had fallen on their friend he could not speak in words of their own new-found love and happiness. When he did break a long silence it was to refer once more to Guy Vanbrugh.

"Who—who will tell him?" he said. "How will he learn?"

Irene Tarleton started.

"How awful!" she cried. "He will hear of it abruptly and by chance, the shock will be cruel—cruel!"

She checked her hack. "We must ride round by the Close," she added with pathetic resolution. "I will tell him myself. I would give worlds not to have to, but I can do it better than anyone else. I will do it—I must do it."

The war-correspondent assented tenderly. "You shall, my brave, kind darling," he said, and the horses were turned out of the high-road to gain the old manor-house, half shooting box, half modest country-seat, that sheltered Guy Vanbrugh's bachelor establishment.

The storm had ceased, but the sky was still overcast and frowning, and the accumulating raindrops dripped wetly upon them from the trees in the dank avenue as they rode up the ivied and straggling front of the Close.

Together they alighted, and Paul Jerome had raised his hand to pull at the twisted iron bell-handle that hung, a relic of bygone days, at the side of the entrance, when the doors in the cool, flagged porch opened, and Guy Vanbrugh himself appeared. His Norfolk jacket and tweed cap showed that he was sallying forth on foot.

"Hullo!" he exclaimed. "Seeking shelter? But no, the storm is over, and you are dry. Come in, you are welcome, whatever brings you?"

He stopped, something in their faces chilling him.

"What's wrong," he continued, "you look very glum, and—Irene, you are crying; in Heaven's name what has happened?"

Irene put her arm in his.

"Guy," she said, "I want to speak to you. Mr. Jerome will wait."

The war-correspondent bent his head, looped over his shoulder the reins of the horses, and got out his cigarette-case ostentatiously. But a servant relieved him of his charge, and he was left without the tactful pretext.

Guy Vanbrugh gazed at him troublously.

"Well," he observed, "you are a pair of sphinxes. However, since you will excuse us, Jerome, perhaps Irene will explain in her own fashion."

With a final searching glance at the war-correspondent, he led his cousin out of the hall into a small ante-chamber that gave upon it. Paul Jerome watched them go, then lit a cigarette hastily and began to walk up and down the hall.

The moments passed, and unconsciously he lengthened the extent of his mechanical sentry-go, until one extremity of it carried him near the unclosed door of the ante-chamber into which Guy Vanbrugh and his cousin had retired.

At last, as he reached its threshold, he looked up, and turned swiftly away. He had seen a pathetic picture. Irene stood by a low table, her hand resting on it, her face pale and drawn, and great tears trembling on her lashes. By it sat Guy Vanbrugh, his head hidden on his arms, a hand clasping mutely a hand of hers. In his hour of desolation—bereft as he was of love and happiness—a woman's friendship was sustaining him.

Paul Jerome moved away and sought the open terrace outside the Close. There, after he had smoked innumerable cigarettes, Irene joined him. Her eyes swam as they met his. The war-correspondent helped her to the saddle, and they rode silently home to the Tower.

TWENTY-NINTH CHAPTER.

"So We Brought It Here."

"Uncle Edward!"

Edward Stormont paused on the threshold of his library, arrested by the call. It had come from the great staircase hard by, and the voice was that of Irene Tarleton. While he hesitated, Irene herself ran down into the hall, darted up to him, thrust open the library door, pushed him gently into the apartment, and followed him, closing the door after her.

"Well, Miss Madcap," said the explorer, as he yielded good-humouredly to this manœuvre, "and what can I do for you this morning?"

Irene drew him to his big chair at the library-table and made him sit down in it.

"Oh, Uncle Edward!" she exclaimed; "do help me."

The explorer stroked his handsome grey beard and put on a judicial air. But his blue eyes twinkled.

"What do you mean by 'help'?" he inquired. "Moral support, advice, consolation, or a leaf out of my cheque-book? You shall have any or all of them, young lady, if they will satisfy you."

His niece flushed at the mention of money.

"You are a brick, uncle," she replied, "but it isn't £. s. d. or consolation we want, and I am afraid we are not in the mood to take advice. But moral support we badly need."

"Indeed!" said Edward Stormont. "And who is 'we'?"

Irene's pink grew red.

"Mr. Jerome and I," she answered.

The explorer laughed out jollily.

"That is how the wind blows, is it?" he retorted. "Well, to what end must I direct my moral support?"

Irene pointed upwards, through the ceiling of the library. The gesture indicated her mother's rooms.

"Mater," she said briefly, "she has always wanted me to marry Guy." At the mention of her cousin's name Irene broke off to sigh. "Of course," she added hastily, not choosing to complicate her own explanation by any reference to Guy Vanbrugh's ill-starred love affair, "Guy and I are good chums, but we have always known that neither of us loved the other, not love with a capital L."

"Yet you do not anticipate," observed Edward Stormont, "that your mother will hail with much enthusiasm the substitution of Jerome for Guy? To be candid, she allowed me recently to perceive that she would not, so you see she is not blind, any more than you. However, what am I to do? I suppose Jerome and you have had the inevitable romantic explanation, and come to a satisfactory understanding?"

"Y—yes," confessed Irene with sudden shyness.

Edward Stormont rose and took her hands in his.

"My heartiest congratulations!" he said. "Jerome is a splendid fellow! You could not have chosen more worthily. I prophesy for you both a rarely happy married life. Jerome is a man to whom I would have esteemed myself fortunate in marrying my own little daughter, had she lived."

Irene threw her arms round the speaker and kissed him frankly.

"Thank you, uncle dear!" she exclaimed.

The explorer returned the salutation with an affectionate gravity.

"And now about your mother?" he pursued. "Does she actually know the position of matters between Jerome and you?"

"That's the trouble," said his niece. "I wouldn't let Paul go and tell her, she would only have insulted him. So this morning I tried to tell her myself. But at the first word she flew into a passion, informed me that, as a prospective heiress and a minor, I was still under her absolute control, and locked me in my room."

"Yet," interpolated Edward Stormont cheerfully, for Irene's face had darkened, and her bosom heaved, "you are here?"

"That was easy enough," intimated Irene, "there is a little dressing-room out of mine, with a borrowed light that opens on to a back landing. I got out that way, found Paul, and held a council of war. Two alternatives presented themselves, to elope, or to appeal to you. I was in favour of eloping before mamma could shut me up more securely!"

She uttered this piece of information with much coolness.

A Woman's Remarkable Test.

Tried 17 Medicines for Indigestion and Biliousness. Only Bile Beans did her any good.

Mothers and heads of families generally who like to know a remedy for various common ailments met with at times in every family, will be interested in the following facts, which were published by the Norwich Mercury, and gleaned by one of the representatives of that paper.

In the little village of Crostwight, in East Norfolk, lives a woman named Dixon. She has lived in her present house for twelve years, and for twenty-five years before that she lived in another cottage quite near her present home. During the whole of that long period—thirty-seven years—she was known to the villagers as an invalid. She had no physical deformity, but her digestion was so weak that illness seemed with her the normal condition. No matter what food she took sickness, more or less severe, followed, and often for days together no food would stay on her stomach. Palpitation, headache, and the long list of painful symptoms which accompany acute indigestion and biliousness were also present. Things which are generally considered as most harmless made her seriously ill, and her husband could not smoke his pipe indoors because the odour of the tobacco brought on violent attacks of retching and sickness. To the medical men Mrs. Dixon was an impossible case. She consulted and was treated by eight doctors in succession, and when they failed to give her any relief she began to "doctor herself," as she expresses it.

She carefully and patiently gave seventeen various remedies a prolonged trial. After taking the sixteenth for a long time she had to admit that she was as bad as when she started with the first. The seventeenth medicine to be tested, however, acted very differently. It was the vegetable preparation known as Bile Beans, and to her delight this well known specific quite cured her. Naturally, the result of the test created considerable discussion in local circles, and the matter reaching the ears of the Mercury man, he investigated the case.

Asked by him if her cure was complete, Mrs. Dixon said: "I am now quite free from the ailments which have troubled me all through life. It was my daughter who first persuaded me to try Bile Beans. I improved after the first few doses, and gradually but surely they have made this great change in me." Apparently Mrs. Dixon is now likely to continue the tenant of the same cottage for another twelve years.

nor did her uncle's fresh burst of laughter disconcert her in the least.

"However," she continued, "Paul persuaded me to give you a trial, and I consented, on condition that I saw you first alone. To tell you the truth, I wasn't sure that I shouldn't have to wheedle you a bit."

With which frank admission Irene went to the door of the library, and opening it, clicked sharply as if she were encouraging a horse. At this signal there was a step in the hall outside, and Paul Jerome entered. The explorer met him with a grim chuckle and an offered hand.

"You are a nice sort of guest, Jerome," he said, "disturbing the peace of a decorous household in this fashion."

The war-correspondent made an apologetic gesture. "I assure you, my dear Stormont," he responded, "that I feel—what I have no doubt I appear to you—a singularly selfish, tactless person. Indeed, I told Miss Tarleton as much when I confessed myself unable to conceal from her any longer the fact that I—— "

"I know," interrupted Edward Stormont, "hearts have a habit of proving stronger than the coolest of judgments, and they are often wiser in the result. Well, I will do what you want me to. I will go and talk to my sister-in-law. Perhaps, having blown off steam in a somewhat unconventional way, she may be more amenable to the sweet influences of diplomacy."

He lingered, studying them with a kindly interest.

"You lucky young beggars," he said, "how happy you must feel! Gather ye roses while ye may—my hands were full of such roses once. I do not complain; I loved and lost, as you may, for even true love does turn the dart of death. But it is something to have loved and been loved!"

The explorer's moved sentences stopped abruptly, and he went out of the library.

Paul Jerome sighed.

"There goes a noble, and a loyal heart, my darling," he exclaimed, "if a man can be said to have a heart who buried it in his wife's grave."

The war-correspondent caught her to him, and clasped her close. "Fate send us better luck than he had," murmured Paul Jerome, "and yet he is right. Nothing can take from us the happiness of having loved."

His arms closed almost convulsively about her; she uttered a little cry, and then smiled.

"What a bear's hug, you stupid darling," she said. "And, besides, you have scratched my hand."

"I am a clumsy fool!" declared the war-correspondent penitently, "but you see, I am not used to making love. I shall learn better manners, I suppose. Let me look at the hand."

He inspected her fingers, the skin had not been broken, but it was grazed in a narrow white streak. The hand had lain against his breast as he clasped her. He felt inquiringly about the pockets of his upper garments for some trifle that might have caused the scratch.

Something attracted his attention, and he searched a vest-pocket, to draw out a scrap of a thick, bent pin, apparently tortoise-shell, and studded on the bend with small stones that might have been turquoises. It had penetrated the rough tweed of his vest and projected in a sharp, irregular point.

"This must be the offender," said Paul Jerome; "now, how on earth did I come by that?"

Irene looked at the fragment. "That is a pretty keepsake," she told him banteringly—"part of a lady's hairpin. Mamma has a set just like it."

Her lover knitted his brows. "I—I seem to remember," he murmured, "picking that up somewhere haphazard. Now where was it?" He gazed dubiously at the broken tortoise-shell-coloured section, with its polished blue stones.

Irene took it from him.

"It is like mamma's," she decided; "I gave her the set myself. Afterwards I was sorry, so many cheap imitations came out."

The war-correspondent lost himself in contemplation. Suddenly he gave vent to a low whistle, and putting a finger and thumb in a vest-pocket, he fished out his match-box. Striking a vesta, he held the bit of pin in the flame. It singed and there was a smell of burning horn.

"It is," he said—"it is genuine; if it were a celluloid imitation it would blaze like tinder."

"Dear me!" ejaculated Irene, puzzled; "what good does it do to know that. What I should like to know is how you got it and why you carry it about with you."

Paul Jerome did not directly answer her. "I picked it up," he intimated slowly, "in Groudle Park and brought it absent-mindedly home. I suppose I must have slipped it into my pocket and forgotten it."

"In Groudle Park," said Irene. "Why, it might, it may be, one of mamma's. Possibly she has lost one."

"Quite possibly," agreed the war-correspondent, and he repossessed himself casually of the piece of pin and pocketed it unostentatiously. Irene had diverted her attention to a clock on the library mantel.

"I wonder how long Uncle Edward will be?" she observed; "the longer he is the more chance there is—if mamma will only listen and argue for a while she may grow sensible. If he stays ten minutes I shall begin to be hopeful."

The estimate was ominous; already the library door was opening to re-admit the explorer. He met their questioning glance with a shrug of the shoulders.

"Beaten in the first round," he reported ruefully; "Irene may both make her bed and lie on it. Her mother will have nothing more to do with her. The law of entail will not allow her actually to disinherit her daughter, but she announces her intention of living as long as she can, and meanwhile expresses the hope that you will, neither of you, under any circumstances, count upon her assistance or recognition."

Irene's lip curled, and she turned to Paul Jerome.

"I told you," she said, "that we might as well elope and have done with it. Uncle Edward," she added, "will you lend us a carriage and allow Mrs. Lintot to get some of my things together?"

The explorer twisted his moustache.

"My dear girl," he replied, "you can't leave us in that fashion. I was only giving you baldly the substance of your mother's views. I did not mean you to take me, or them, too literally. Flight of the sort you suggest might seriously compromise Jerome's reputation, to say nothing of your own."

He stepped a pace nearer Irene and glanced disarmingly into her rebellious countenance.

"If you must decide finally between your mother and your chosen husband," he pursued, "I will see if I cannot find you a suitable home and chaperon pending arrangements for a straightforward, if quiet, wedding. What do you say, Jerome?"

"What can I say, Stormont," answered the war-correspondent, shaking off a certain abstraction, "but that I am profoundly grateful for your kindness and deeply appreciative of your tact. But I may be pardoned for pointing out that Lady Tarleton has already attempted forcibly to restrain Irene's movements, and may do so again. I begin to think that she is a woman of a more unusual type than I had suspected."

Edward Stormont hesitated. "Upon my word, Jerome," he rejoined, "I scarcely know what to say, but I am very far from suggesting that you should withdraw your protection, even temporarily, from Irene. Yet, although my sister-in-law has a rarely strong character and an indomitable will, I should trust that——"

He was interrupted; a servant had entered the room.

"Well?" said the explorer.

The footman came forward into the apartment; he was carrying a flat, rather angular parcel, wrapped in brown paper.

"Two men, sir," he explained, "from Groudle—fishermen, sir, wish to see you with reference to this. I told them you disliked being disturbed in the morning and they consented to allow me to bring it in."

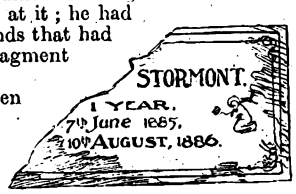
"Put it down, then," directed his master irritably; "I will look at it later on."

"Yes, sir," said the servant; "and are they to have any remuneration, sir?—they spoke of the thing being, they thought, silver."

"Confound it!" exclaimed Edward Stormont; "open it and let us find out what all the fuss is about!"

The man obeyed, and tore off the wrappings. A flat, triangular section of damp wood was revealed. To it was attached a metal plate, also triangular but jagged along one edge. The plate was marked with a name and dates, and read:



The explorer stood looking at it; he had become very pale and the hands that had taken up the damp wooden fragment were twitching.

"June the seventh, eighteen eighty-five," he said; "my little girl's birthday; August the tenth eighty-six, the day she died. What—what is this and where did it come from?"

"I understood, sir," answered the servant, "the men to say that it had been found on the beach, and having your name on it they thought it might interest you."

Edward Stormont took a stride towards the door, but halted. "No," he said, "send the men in." And he waited impatiently till the order was carried out and two burly, bearded figures made their appearance.

The explorer went to meet them.

"Well, my men," he began, "this is a curious find of yours. Did you pick it up yourselves?"

One of the fishermen replied with a motion that indicated his companion.

"My mate did, sir," he said; "it blew heavyish in the night—the thunderstorm having freshened the air, you see—and we was strolling along the edge of the tide this morning, having a look at the drift, sir, when he spots something shiny. He picks it up, and it was that."

"Yes, sir," chimed in his partner, "and though it didn't seem to be of much value, barring that the metal might be silver, it had your name on it, sir. So we brought it here."

The explorer turned the thing over in his hands.

"Cast up by the sea," he muttered; "of all impossible coincidences, this would appear to be the most impossible."

He held out to Paul Jerome the damp, splintered wood and inscribed metal.

"Sixteen years ago," he said, "I saw such a plate upon the lid of my only child's tiny coffin. The words 'Born' and 'Died' and her Christian name are missing, otherwise it might be the same. The dates are correct, and the metal has evidently come from a coffin-plate."

Jerome touched it curiously and Irene also. The coincidence—if coincidence if were—was inexpressibly weird.

"It cannot be the same, however," pursued the explorer, laying the wooden fragment down and brushing the sea-sand from his fingers. "How could that get from the mausoleum in the park to Groudle Bay? No, someone died on the same day as my little Moira—someone who had been born on her birthday and who was called Stormont."

The war-correspondent's gaze fixed like that of one who is mesmerised.

"Moira," he said slowly—'Groudle Bay, the mausoleum—Good Heavens!"

Edward Stormont caught him by the elbow.

"Jerome," he cried, "what are you saying—what do you mean?"

Paul Jerome was scarcely conscious of his friend's question. He had taken from his pocket the fragment of turquoise and tortoise-shell. He thrust it back hastily, and, with a kind of shudder, to draw the explorer aside.

"Stormont," he said in a low tone, "do you remember one day when you complained of finding the mausoleum unlocked?"

The explorer started.

"Yes," he answered, "but what—you don't mean—oh, who could be so inhuman as wantonly to desecrate——?"

The war-correspondent checked his excited outburst.

"I don't know what to think," he said; "I have plunged suddenly into the heart of a profound and inexplicable mystery of whose existence I have been for some time cognisant. The only way of fathoming it seems to be——" He broke off. "Unless," he added, "that would be too painful for you?"

"What were you going to say?" demanded Edward Stormont curtly. Jerome encountered his friend's gaze steadily.

"To see," he continued, completing his unfinished observation, "if the mausoleum itself has anything to tell us."

Edward Stormont's bearded jaw set sternly. "You are right," he said, "and if we find that even the sacred slumbers of the dead are not secure from human intrusion, I shall know how to discover and deal with the guilty."

Jerome turned away with a sigh and answered nothing. Stormont got out a sovereign purse, to give the fishermen a gold coin apiece, and dismissed them. Then he came back to Jerome.

"Now," he said, "we will make the investigation you suggest. But what about Irene and your own problems?"

The war-correspondent frowned.

"Perhaps," he responded, "the settlement of the one problem will facilitate the settlement of the other. But as we can hardly allow Irene to accompany us on our present errand, I shall advise her to lock herself in this room. That will prevent any further attempt on Lady Tarleton's part to make a prisoner of her. She need not open until I return, to anybody."

The explorer knitted his brows over the first of these sentences. But Jerome offered no explanation and they passed out of the library together. The war-correspondent stayed a moment without until Irene—scarcely less perplexed than her uncle—had secured the door. This done he went to his room for a hat. The explorer did the same.

They left the Tower by the window of the justice-room. Edward Stormont had guided their steps thither to obtain a great key that hung in a certain cupboard. It was that of the mausoleum.

IMPORTANT TO WOMEN.

A WONDERFUL BEAUTIFIER.

A SHORT time since our readers were informed about that wonderful preparation for the complexion, Peralia, and strongly advised to try it for blackheads, acne, wrinkles, crow's feet, pimples, &c. Now listen to what a recent user has got to say about it: "In reply to your kind letter, I have taken your advice and have procured a bottle of Henderson's Peralia from Boot's Drug Stores. Well! I must say I was astonished at the result. I have spent large amounts on so-called remedies, but with indifferent success; but one bottle of Peralia entirely removed the scurvy from which I was suffering from my face, and the unnatural redness from my nose. I am now using it on my hands and arms, which it has made lovely and white, and also find it excellent for chapped hands. I am in a large milliner's shop, and all the girls in our establishment use Peralia, and think it is lovely.—Yours faithfully, Ada Fleming, Station Street, Nottingham." That ought to be a sufficient testimonial for any reader, and we hope any of them that are suffering from such disfiguring humours will act on our advice, and at once give Peralia a trial. The Peralia Company is a very enterprising firm, and they are now making a present of a dainty little book, called "Beauty's Boudoir," to every purchaser of Peralia who asks for it. We are of the opinion that none of our lady readers should be without it. By the way, the prices of Peralia, post free, in plain wrapper, are 1s. 3d., 1s. 9d., and 2s. 9d.

Many of our readers, we are sure, would like to know of a really reliable hair curler. When we say reliable, we mean one that is not affected by rain, or the heat of a ballroom. To those who are interested, and are anxious to possess neat, curly locks, we recommend "Crimpoline." It is nothing short of marvellous the manner in which this fluid sets about its business. All you have got to do is simply to apply a little to your hair for a few nights and you soon become the owner of lovely wavy ringlets. No! you need no tongs, pins nor curlers. Sounds almost to good to be true, doesn't it? Well, try it and see for yourself. Several who have used it tell us that once you get the hair properly in curl with it, you need only use it once in the week. Its price is so very moderate, too, that none of our readers need be hindered from sending for it on that account. If you write to the proprietors, enclosing 2s. or 2s. 9d., either in stamps, or a postal order, they will send you a bottle, post free, and secretly packed. Their address is the Peralia Perfumery Co., Dept. 14, Camden Street, North Shields.

Mysteries of Hypnotism Revealed.

This book was printed for you; it was printed to teach the public the many marvels of the wonder power of the age; it was printed that all might learn the long lost secrets of a hidden science; it was printed for the poor as well as the rich, that all might stand an equal chance in the race of life. The finest artists were employed to illustrate it. Twenty eminent scientists divulge their secrets in its intensely interesting pages. No other book of the kind in any way compares with it; no other book is so beautiful, so interesting, so thrilling, so comprehensive, so practical. It is a work that should be in every home. It should be read by every father and mother. It tells how you may learn the marvelous mysteries of the greatest power known to man. For a limited time only it will be sent to any address absolutely free.

This grand book gives you the key to the inner secrets of mind control. It describes practical methods for using hypnotism and personal magnetism in business and society. It tells how to strengthen your will power, your memory, your self-confidence. It tells you how to drive all suggestions of failure from your mind and replace it with a firm determination to succeed in anything you undertake. It tells you how to brush aside all hindrances to your progress and success. It gives you the ability to impress people with your real worth. It tells you how to completely master human minds and strangely control the thoughts, actions, and desires of whom ever you will. The American College guarantees to teach you all these things, and hundreds of others equally beneficial. You can learn at home during your leisure hours.

When you master hypnotism and personal magnetism you will be in possession of a mighty advantage over your fellow-men. You will be able to pass your competitors in any line of endeavour; you will be able to fascinate and influence others; you can do a vast amount of good by curing diseases and bad habits; you can change the bad disposition of children and correct their evil tendencies; you can earn a great deal of money by treating people; you can develop to a marvelous degree any musical or dramatic talent you or your friends may possess; you can give thrilling hypnotic demonstrations and afford your friends an endless source of amusement; you can be the centre of attraction at any social gathering; you can cure yourself of business or domestic worry; you can win the everlasting friendship of those you desire; you can protect yourself against the influence of others; you can develop your telepathic or clairvoyant power; you can increase your salary or income; you can win wealth and renown. If you want a copy of the remarkable book here mentioned, which clearly explains the wonders of Hypnotism and discloses its deepest mysteries, send your name and address on penny postcard to the American College of Sciences, Dept. GIVES INSTANT RELIEF TO HEADACHE, TOOTHACHE, NERVE PAINS

Neuralgia is a Disease of the Nerves, and most commonly attacks the nerves of the face. Its presence is announced by the most piercing darting pains, recurring in paroxysms, followed with brief intervals of relief; but hardly a moment elapses after a lacerating pain darts along the course of the affected nerve ere another shoots forth, inflicting pain equally distressing to the patient. The annexed cut presents in the prominent lines the nerves of the fifth branch, which are most liable to attacks of Neuralgia. All who suffer from this terrible pain, or from Headache, Toothache, or nerve pains generally, will be glad to know of ZOX, a Simple, Safe and easy Remedy certified free from injurious substance by no less an authority than Dr. A. A Hammock Proposal.

MOLLY: "Jack Peters proposed to me while we were sitting in the hammock." Dolly: "Then you can consider him a net profit."

Only Presents Now.

"So she's really going to be married?" "Yes." "I suppose she thinks of nothing but the future?" "Well, she only talks of the presents."

How It's Kept in Place.

"WHAT is it, do you suppose, that keeps the moon in place, and prevents it from falling?" asked Araminta. "I think it must be the beams," replied Charlie, softly.

Good for Trade.

"YES, George, it is better to have loved and lost than never to have loved at all. It is better for the jeweller, and the florist, and the postal system, and sometimes for the lawyers."

Cards Are Out Now!

"How many stars can you see?" she asked. "Two more than you," said he. "How do you make that out?" she asked. "I can see your eyes," said he. And that was the beginning of it all.

The Manly Man.

HE: "You say you like a manly man. What is your idea of a manly man?" She: "Well, for instance, one who doesn't stay and stay and stay, just because he knows the girl isn't strong enough to throw him out."

The Fatal Flirtation.

MR. PECK: "What is that book you are reading, my dear?" Mrs. Peck: "It's a novel, entitled 'A Fatal Flirtation,' with such a sad ending." Mr. Peck: "Something like ours, I presume?"

What Did It Mean?

MARIE: "I told papa, Willie, dear, that I thought you were just too lovely for any use." Willie: "And what did he say, darling?" Marie: "He said he feared as much. Now, what could he have meant by that, Willie, dear?"

Wanted the Letter to Go.

"WHAT in the name of Jupiter did you sew up all the pockets in my overcoat for this morning?" "Dearest, that letter I gave you to post was very important, and I intended to make sure you carried it in your hand."

New Use for a Cyclometer.

SUE: "Is this your cyclometer on the mantelpiece?" He: "Yes." She: "Why, it only registers 2! Is that all the miles you have ridden in six months?" He: "Oh, no! I keep that to tell the number of instalments I have paid."

An Impossible Task.

HE: "What would you say if I were to steal a kiss from you?" She: "But that is impossible." He: "Impossible! Why so, pray?" She: "Because you can't steal anything I haven't got, and no one has ever given me a kiss—see?"

How Unkind!

"THIS," said Mr. Flitter, "is a photograph of the only girl I ever loved." "How cleverly," said Miss Wyse, as she looked at the portrait, "they do get up these composite photographs!"

A Dilemma.

SHE (alarmed): "Oh, Tom, why do you make such awful faces at me?" He (contritely): "I can't help it, dear. My eyeglass is falling out, and I don't want to let go of your hands."

He Spoke Feelingly.

"AFTER all," remarked the sentimental wife, "home is the dearest spot on earth." "That's so," replied the practical head of the family, as he finished auditing last month's grocery bill.

She Couldn't Expect it.

HE: "You don't love me as you did before we were married." She: "Of course I don't, John. You wouldn't expect a woman to love a married man as she could a bachelor, would you?"

Found Her Out.

"No, father," the fair girl said, "Mr. Allingham may not be rich, but his heart is in the right place." "Humph!" retorted the crusty old doctor; "you've had your ear against it, eh?"

The Quotation Didn't Apply.

MR. EMPECK: "'There is a tide in the affairs of men which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune.'" Mrs. Empeck: "Yes, but you seem to have embarked on it in a leaky old boat with only one oar."

It Would Save 'Bus Fares.

"JOHN, dear, I wish you would get me a brougham." "My darling Amy. Didn't I tell you we must economise?" "Yes, that's why I want the brougham. Think of the omnibus fares I'd save."

They Don't Want Leading.

BLOBBS: "What nonsense it is for newspapers in their accounts of weddings to describe the brides being led to the altar?" Slobbs: "How so?" Blobbs: "Why, most of the girls could find their way in the dark."

The Late Visitor.

MR. STAYLATE: "I hear your mother's step on the stairs, and I shall be able to bid her good-night." Sleepy Beauty (wearily): "It can't be mother. She's a late sleeper. Probably it is the servant coming down to light the fire."

Which of the Six?

"You will marry a tall, dark gentleman," said the fortune-teller, examining the lines on the fair hand. "That doesn't help me at all," despairingly replied the lovely blonde who had called to consult her. "All six of them are tall, dark gentlemen."

Beating About the Bush.

"So you are having your house redecorated, Mr. Hawkins?" "Yes; the workmen began last week." "Are you making radical changes?" "Yes—very." "What is to be the main feature of the new house?" "You—if you'll consent."

She Didn't Want Long.

"GEORGE," she said, in a nervous whisper, "you must give me time—you must give me time." "How long?" he hoarsely asked; "a day, a week, a month, a year?" "No—no, George," and she quickly scanned the sky; "only until the moon gets behind a cloud."

Good Use for Him.

BOBBY (to young Mr. Fatboy): "I heard my sister Clara say something lovely to ma about you, Mr. Fatboy." Young Mr. Fatboy (anxiously): "No; did you, Bobby? What was it?" Bobby: "She said you would be lovely to sit on the big dictionary to press autumn leaves."

Wants to be an Actress.

So you too, "HAZEL EYES," have the stage fever. You want to become an actress, do you? You are eighteen, tall, fair, and "plump of figure."

* * * * *

Well, the life of a successful actress is very pleasing to one's vanity, and even a fairly good one has a very good time. But a young lady who is not naturally fond of acting and does not feel that she must act, to gratify some instinctive prompting, should leave the stage severely alone. It spoils a woman for domestic life, brings her into contact with a class of people who can do her no good, and often brings her into trouble. So I should not worry myself any more about it, unless you really have some exceptional stage talent. Your friends are the best judges as to that, and I should go by their advice.

A Silly Trick.

"LILY" is suffering from the results of "Strategy for Sweethearts." I am often asked by young men how they can go to work to hurry on marriage with their lady-loves. "LILY'S" young man hit on the following scheme: He is a clerk in an Indian merchant's office, and told "LILY" that he had a chance of going abroad for two or three years for his firm. He asked "LILY" to marry him without the knowledge of his employers, who would think him too young to go to India married. He persuaded "LILY," and went to get a special license.

As "LILY" could not marry without her parents' consent—she is under age—the scheme fell through. Then the young man told "LILY" it was all a trick. He was not going abroad at all, but simply wanted to marry her at once because of his love for her, and could not wait till his position improved. Do I advise "LILY" to break off the engagement?

* * * * *

He acted in a rash way, "LILY," and I never approve of deception, even when love is the cause. He had no business to try to trap you into a premature marriage, and certainly deserves the punishment you threaten. Had you married him, as you say, not only might his own prospects have been ruined, and his chance of advancement gone, but he would have dragged you into trouble with your parents, and perhaps poverty.

* * * * *

Now, I don't advise you to break off with him if you both really love each other, but I think for some time I should let him know how strongly you condemn his deception. Let him have an opportunity to think it over, and make amends by working hard at his business to improve his position. It would be better for him if he could go abroad for two years, as that would make him more useful to his employers. At his age and yours the first consideration is to make a position. You should not stand in his way.

A Young Story Writer.

THE Editor tells me, "Amy," that he will be glad to see your story. It need not be typewritten, provided the writing is quite legible. The length may be anything from one thousand to three thousand words. You should inclose a stamped, addressed envelope for the return of the story if it is not accepted.

Rather Too Young.

"INQUIRER."—Yes, seventeen is rather young, certainly, for a girl to enter into an affair with a young man without her parents' knowledge. You say the young lady and yourself have been going out for five months, in spite of the fact that her parents have forbidden her to speak to young men. You yourself don't know anyone who could introduce you to her parents.

* * * * *

Don't you think you had better postpone further connection with her until she is older? Meanwhile, why not try to get to know her parents by some way or another. Surely the girl has some boy cousins of your own age whom you could get to know, or perhaps she takes part in Church or Sunday-school work, in which you might also join, and strike up a proper acquaintance that way, of which her parents would approve. I cannot advise you to continue a secret friendship with the girl against her parents' wishes, as of course until she is a certain age they are the best judges on her behalf.

Is He in Love?

"HOPEFUL" does not know whether he is in love with a certain girl or whether he is merely fond of her as a friend. He takes her out to theatres and concerts, and both of them enjoy being with each other. When they part "HOPEFUL" feels sad, and he believes she feels the same. He feels he would miss her very much if she were separated from him. What do I advise? He has not yet had the courage to talk to her of his feelings.

* * * * *

If you don't really feel passionately towards her, and do not think of her as the only woman in the world, why trouble yourself as to your feelings? If a man or a woman is in love, really and truly, they don't cast about in their minds, but are only too powerfully aware of the fact. You are evidently very friendly with the girl. Continue to be so, and if later on you think of marriage, and are in a position to become engaged, pop the question and see what happens.

Getting Married.

How soon after your engagement should you begin to arrange the wedding, "ALPHONSE"? Well, you should start at once. First there is the question of means. You know whether you have saved enough to go to work with the first details, such as selecting a house, arranging matters with the landlord, furniture, linen, plate, and other necessaries. In those matters your fiancée should be taken into your confidence, as they will affect her more than you in after life.

* * * * *

Of course a good deal must depend on the month of the ceremony and where you will spend the honeymoon. The best time would be June, July, or August, so that you two could spend your summer holiday—if you get one—together. Christmas is rather a bad time, as there are very few places where a married couple would be comfortable at that time of year, seeing that everybody is in the family circle and hotels rather desolate.

* * * * *

One more word—don't hang about your future bride the week or two before the wedding day. She won't be at her best, neither will her parents, and they will have a lot of things to arrange which do not require your aid.

THE GRAMOPHONE

OUT OF DOORS.

NEW STYLE.

No. 3
£3 3s.

Oak Cabinet. Concert Sound Box, Horn, 14in., Nickel.

IN A COUNTRY GARDEN:

In the peaceful quiet of a summer evening the Gramophone affords the most delightful and soothing entertainment. Those tired with the day's work can sit and listen to the finest artistes of the day. In the cool of the evening in a low deck chair the brain-fagged worker finds indeed that music hath charms. We offer nearly 10,000 different records to choose from.

ON THE RIVER BANKS:

Nowhere is the Gramophone heard to better advantage than when played across the river on a still summer's evening. All the tone and quality of the great artistes' voices come gently swelling over the echoing water. There is no need to breathe the vitiated air of a crowded concert-room or theatre. On the river bank where all is peace, the Gramophone brings you the best music you could hear from far-off crowded cities.

ON A YACHT:

Far away from opera houses, theatres, concert-rooms, and music-halls, the yachtsman sometimes spends his evenings regretting that his love for the sea deprives him of music he would otherwise enjoy. He has only to buy a Gramophone, which is essential to every yacht, from the half-rater to ocean-going steam craft. On board, the Gramophone is a constant and never-failing source of delight to owners, their friends, and to the crew.

On receipt of a postcard we will send you Catalogues and give you the name and address of the nearest dealer in our Gramophones. Be sure you get a Gramophone, however. There are several Talking machines, but there is only one Gramophone, which is made in styles to suit all pockets by

THE BOND BETWEEN.

A Romance of Real Life. By BLANCHE EARDLEY.

PROLOGUE.

The Wedding.

"THOSE whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder." The sacred words were droned in monotonous tones of long usage by the lean, apathetic curate, who but dimly observed the faces of the man and woman before him, whose lives he was knitting together irrevocably and for all time, until the grave should give up her dead.

They were but one of the many hundreds of couples that took the vows of marriage upon them under his guidance, and except that the face of the bride was one of strange loveliness and youth, they were in no way different from those others who had gone before.

The church was empty of all save the principals in the marriage ceremony, and the responses of the loud-voiced verger sent a hoarse whisper reverberating round the sacred edifice.

The dull grey fog of late October had crept insidiously up the aisle, and enveloped the four figures in a misty haze; the slim left hand of the bride, with the shining gold of a new wedding-ring on the third finger, alone was the attraction of a solitary shaft of timorous light that fell slantingly from a side window.

The ceremony was over. In the vestry the newly-married couple signed the register with icy fingers, the verger being the only witness present, who added his name after theirs.

There were no congratulations to receive; no bevy of joyous bridesmaids for the proud groom to salute; no confetti-throwing or sweet-voiced choristers to sing "The Voice that Breathed o'er Eden." The bridegroom tipped the obsequious verger, then as silently as they had entered the church they left it—man and wife—"for better, for worse, for richer, for poorer."

"Sweetheart," he murmured, looking down at the white, lovely face of the girl he had made his own, "look up at me—smile into my eyes. This is our wedding-day!"

She raised the heavy, blue-veined lids, and revealed a pair of eyes of the deepest violet found in the heart of a pansy; eyes so perfect that they might be excused if human hearts were wrecked to gain a smile from them.

"I am cold and miserable!" she answered, with a swift smile that acted as a solace to her words. "Let us get away from this horrid fog, Vernon; it has struck a chill into my very heart. I can smile in the sunshine, but gloom makes me wretched."

"Hush, darling!" he whispered. "Don't let us leave the church where we have knelt and taken marriage vows upon us with words of regret! In the darkest shadows my love for you would warm me, and keep hope in my heart."

She nestled up to him prettily, as he wrapped her tenderly round with a rug. He then kissed the proud, vivid mouth of his bride, Margaret Grant, who, an hour ago, was Margaret Heath, orphan, dependent upon the charity of an old maiden aunt. They had met but a month ago, and now this girl, beautiful as the first young buds of Spring, was his wife, to keep and cherish till death did them part.

"Cheer up, little wife!" he said; "life is going to be a long dream of happiness for us both. Something to look back to when the clouds come; our little bark will weather the storm together!"

"We must never have storms and gloom, Vernon," she exclaimed. "I want the sunshine and roses of life, not the gloom and the thorns. Poverty and sickness I could not bear. Promise me that you will keep them from me?"

She leant her exquisite face on his shoulder, and, gazing into so much beauty, he could make no other answer than the one he did. His arm tightened around her slender waist:

"Beloved! All my efforts will be to keep your feet in the sunny way; but you know," he went on, half-seriously, half-playfully, "Fate is the artist who paints the clouds in the canvas of our happiness. But you love me so dearly that even the things you hate would not influence that love!" he cried passionately. "Were I a pauper you would not change?"

She moved her head restlessly.

"Of course not, Vernon, dear," she smiled sweetly. "I love you very much—you know I do. But don't ask me horrid questions about paupers!" she pouted. "How can I tell what I would do in circumstances impossible to occur?"

He smiled, then sighed. How could he, a grave, struggling journalist of thirty, expect his child-wife to understand the real significance of the marriage service? She was so young—only seventeen.

"A rose with all its sweetest leaves yet folded."

His position was almost assured, and he had money saved up for a rainy day. Besides, there was Digby—dear old Digby Scarlett, his friend and collaborator in their first novel. He had Digby to fall back upon in the hour of need. He looked at his wife. What was she thinking about? he wondered.

"A penny for your thoughts, darling," he said abruptly.

She laughed—a pretty, girlish laugh.

"They are worth more than that, Vernon! They were about money—oh, heaps of it!" She clasped her hands impulsively. "I was looking forward to the beautiful things I would buy with it! The places I would see, and the people I would conquer with it! Oh, Vernon, I am so glad you are a rich man!"

Excitement had lent a sparkle to her eyes, and a pink flush to her pale cheeks. Rarely before had he seen her look so lovely, and he vowed never to let her know he was not a rich man. He would work hard, and make the money she already imagined he had. To see the look of disillusion in those pansy-like eyes would spell death to him.

That evening, after they had crossed the Channel, and were sitting in a private room in a Parisian hotel, Vernon Grant put a velvet case in his young bride's hand.

"A wedding jewel for my matchless one!" he said tenderly. She took it with an exclamation of surprise.

"Oh, Vernon! Another present? How lovely! What is it?"

He smiled, elated like a schoolboy at her pleasure.

"Your birthday is also our wedding-day, darling, October the thirtieth; so I have given you a trinket that represents the jewel of the month you were born—an opal ring."

"An opal, Vernon!" she said, with a sudden shiver. "Oh, how unlucky! Opals are stones of ill-omen! I almost wish you had chosen some other kind."

She put the case down with a petulant gesture, then, seeing his look of disappointment, said quickly:

"I will try and get rid of my superstition, as you did not know! See, Vernon! I will wear it now, in defiance of all precedent!" She slipped it on her finger, and laughed in his face. "We can afford to scoff at omens!"

After dinner Margaret opened the long windows and stepped on to the balcony. There was no fog; just a clear sky, and a luminous moon lent a silver haze to the streets, and threw shadows into unexpected places. Vernon Grant followed his wife.

"See, beloved!" he whispered, bending his face to touch the burnished hair on his shoulder, "there is the twin-sister to our 'honeymoon'!"

The Honeymoon.

DIGBY SCARLETT turned over his letters leisurely in the interim between breakfast and sorting a cigar.

In appearance he was not bad-looking, being tall and well-built, with sleek hair and gleaming teeth that showed on rare occasions in a smile that mocked, or jeered, but never caressed.

A student of the human face may have noticed that his eyes were set too closely into his aquiline nose, and had also contracted a habit of not looking straight at his interlocutor, but rather obliquely, or through half-closed li[ds].

The lips, though well shaped and red, were spoilt by a perpetual sneer, while on the upper one there was a faint, bluish mark, either the relic of some fighting contest, or a birth-mark, but it added to the sinister expression of his face.

He fingered his letters thoughtfully.

"U—mph! They don't look very important. Duns, bills, and a few invitations! Ah! There's one from my friend and collaborator, the valiant Vernon! I wonder what the Paris post-mark means? Anyway it can wait. I will first do what has taken me so long to make up my mind about, ask adorable Margaret Heath to be my wife.

"I did not know the little witch had taken such a hold on me! I, Digby Scarlett, am honestly in love with a child, and one as intangible as a sunbeam! She seemed to like me when Grant and I stayed with her aunt, but I don't fancy Love has found a place in her vocabulary—yet."

He lighted his cigar, then sat down at his desk, and in a few brief sentences signed his name to the first offer of marriage he had made in thirty years of life. With a half-sneer at his own weakness, he addressed and sealed the letter, then lit the cigar that had gone out.

"There! Now I'll give a few seconds to Vernon." He opened the letter carelessly, and for a time there was no sound in the room save the ticking of an ormolu clock on the mantel, and the purr of a placid cat on the hearthrug.

Digby Scarlett rose slowly; his face was a shade paler than usual, which perhaps made the blue mark on his lip look more strikingly apparent. He kicked the cat from the hearthrug, then smiled grimly when the animal returned and rubbed itself against his leg.

"Is that a prophetic sign, puss, that the people I kick will come back to my feet? I fancy it is. I fancy it will be so one day."

He looked at himself in the glass, and his hand went up to the blur on his lip. He frowned thoughtfully, stroking it with gentle fingers.

"Twice hit by the same hand," he murmured; "and both blows destined to die with me—to bleed internally! Not bad for a man intellectually my inferior! But the third blow I shall get in. My innings begins to-day. He laughs best who laughs last!"

He wrote a few letters, lit another cigar, then pulled a Bradshaw towards him.

"I'll look up the trains now."

As he opened the book, a piece of paper fluttered from between the leaves. "Ah! a note of some sort," he muttered, looking at it curiously. Then, as he looked, his face changed colour, and a curious light came into his eyes.

"By Jove! Fate is dealing me trumps this time. A bigger deal than I hoped to play!"

It was a piece of paper—blank, save for the signature of "Digby Scarlett," but not quite in the hand usually signed by that gentleman, though perilously near to be mistaken at first sight for the genuine thing.

He remembered the occasion very well. He and Vernon Grant had been, some few weeks ago, trying to outvie with the other in copying their respective signatures, with the result that Digby Scarlett had made a very poor show, and Vernon Grant had surpassed even the signature of the man he had imitated.

"Why," he had laughed to his friend, "with a little practice I should turn out a very good disciple of 'Jim the Penman'!"

"With a little practice!" Digby Scarlett murmured, putting the piece of paper in his pocket. "I fancy I can oblige my friend in his desire for fame!"

* * * * *

"Well, old man, it is a real treat to see you again. We were thinking of leaving Paris after three weeks of gaiety. Margaret is actually longing for England! Have you seen her?"

Digby Scarlett nodded his head.

"Yes, we met on the staircase, you lucky Benedict! I congratulate you! She hardly remembered me, though," he laughed; "you appear to have ousted all memories from her mind."

Digitized by Google

"I love her deeply," replied Vernon Grant simply. "I hope, Digby," he went on, "you don't think it was mean of me springing this on you so suddenly? It has been like a whirlwind—our engagement of a few days, and then our marriage."

Digby Scarlett raised his hand and touched the mark on his lip. It was a habit of his when thinking deeply.

"Of course not. By the way, you remember the bet we had about imitating each other's signature?" he began abruptly.

"Yes," laughed the other lightly. "What of it?"

"Only this. I had another bet the other day with a chap. He was struck with the similarity, but laid me a hundred pounds that I could not get a bank to take it. I said they would notice nothing; and I want you to help me win the bet."

Vernon Grant laughed.

"What! And compound a felony? Do you mean you want me to present a cheque from you at your bank, signed by myself as you?"

"Yes. I'll trust you not to stick to the money, though," Digby Scarlett retorted with a grin. "I only want to see if it's possible to do it. And Lacy will pay me the hundred on my word, and a letter from you."

"I'm afraid my hand is not in good form," said the other thoughtfully. "Besides, it's risky; the bank may not regard it as a joke!"

"Nonsense, I'll stand by you and explain!" Scarlett interrupted quickly. The blood in his veins was throbbing like the propellers of an engine, and the scar on his lip felt like a burn.

"Look, practice on this piece of paper, then I'll give you the cheque when your hand has regained its cunning!"

He pushed a pen into Grant's unwilling fingers. And for a few seconds the younger man wrote quickly the name of "Digby Scarlett."

"There!" he laughed, entering into the spirit of the game, for him—though he knew it not—a game of Death; "now hand over the cheque, and I'll bet that you will win your hundred pounds the moment we land in England."

He quickly wrote the signature of his friend at the foot of the cheque, filling in his own name as the person to whom the money was to be paid, and then paused.

"How much is the joke to cost?"

"Oh, fill it in for five thousand," said the other carelessly, "I know I can trust you!"

"Rather!"

Then Vernon Grant rose from the table and slipped the cheque into his pocket as Margaret entered the room.

Three days later they landed in England.

"Cash that to-morrow, Vernon, early," said Scarlett in a low tone, as he parted from them; "and wire me when you leave the bank. Oh, by the way, here's your coat; I think I took it in mistake!"

He moved away, and as he settled back in his hansom he laughed softly: "My visit to Paris was not wasted. I fancy this scores one to me!"

In the Trap.

It was dinner time, and Vernon Grant and his lovely girl-bride were preparing for a happy evening together at the theatre. As they rose from the table two men were shown into the room.

"Vernon Grant?" said one interrogatively, while his companion edged towards the door.

Vernon Grant gazed from one to the other.

"That is my name," he said haughtily; "but I don't understand the meaning of this visit."

"You will shortly," replied the man grimly. "I have here a warrant for your arrest on a charge of forgery."

"Forgery?" A short laugh burst from Vernon Grant's lips. "I can easily explain matters if it is about the cheque I presented yesterday. My friend, Mr. Scarlett, will make it clear at once."

"I have nothing to do with that," replied the representative of the law, gruffly. "And I must warn you that anything you say now will be used in evidence against you. We have a cab outside," he went on, "you had better say 'Good-bye' to your lady, then come."

For a moment it dawned upon him that matters were serious. Then he thought of the laugh he and Scarlett would have at the law's expense when all was explained.

He turned to his wife. She had uttered no cry during the interview, but he noticed that her delicate young beauty had aged as though a sudden blight had fallen upon it.

"It's all right, darling," he said tenderly. "I shall return to-night and tell you all that has happened."

She shrank from him quickly, and in the violet eyes she flashed upon him lay the shadow of an awakened hate.

"Don't touch me; don't speak to me; only go!" she panted; and, bitterly wounded in his love, Vernon Grant, after one last yearning look at his bride, left the room with the men who waited for him.

* * * * * *

The doom had gone forth! After a long trial, in which the evidence of his friend, Digby Scarlett, had only served to tighten the coil of Fate round his neck, Vernon Grant left the dock with stumbling feet and dazed senses, while ringing in his ears was the echo of the judge's sentence: "Fifteen years' penal servitude!"

Everything had gone against him, and the very fact that in his overcoat was the piece of paper on which were the few attempts to master his friend's name, had strengthened conviction. Then the money was found on him; and his plea that it was to serve his friend to win a bet was put aside as barefaced and insolent.

He had listened eagerly for Digby Scarlett to defend him, and when that gentleman, gently and sorrowfully, had declared all ignorance concerning their compact, and had confessed to carelessness regarding his care of his cheque-book, Vernon Grant, in the bitterness of his soul, began to understand the moving of the waters beneath the ripples—his friend had betrayed him, like Judas of old! But there was his poor young bride. In her lay his hope of living down the years before him, and avenging vengeance!

Permission had been obtained for an interview with Margaret, the last, for how long? She had been in court that day, for he had caught a glimpse of her red-gold hair under the thick veil as he stood in the dock.

The turning of a grating key in the heavy lock of his cell-door made him flush, and catch his breath. It was his wife, come to say "Good-bye!"

The door was partially closed, and they were alone.

"Margaret! My darling! God forgive me for dragging your young life into such an atmosphere!" he said, in a broken voice. "But you will wait for me, dearest, won't you? The years will fly by, and we shall be together again; and I shall then seek out my enemy, and kill him!"

"I have come to say 'Good-bye,'" said the clear, cold voice of the girl, drawing away from his outstretched hand. "Not for so many years, but for ever! You have spoilt one month of my life," she went on passionately, "but I mean to live the years for myself.

"I don't pity you—I hate you! Shame and disgrace are my wedding portion from you, and I never wish to see your face again! I have already destroyed your wedding-ring—see!" and she held out her left hand, slim and ringless. "That opal was an omen, after all! Good-bye!"

He bowed his head dully.

"You are justified in what you say, but I think you might have been kinder. I have suffered too. But you may go, and I promise to annoy you in no way. But, Margaret," he cried despairingly, "kiss me 'good-bye'; in the name of womanhood have some mercy on me—your husband. Remember your vows—'for better, for worse; for richer, for poorer.'"

"I remember only that you are a felon, and that I am your wife," she retorted bitterly; then, with a slight gesture, she slipped past his outstretched arms into the corridor beyond, and the convict flung himself down on the plank bed and burst into the tears that saved his reason."

FIRST CHAPTER.

Two Birthdays.

IT was late autumn, and Nature had donned her livery of old-gold and tinted browns, while in the air there lingered that faint, indefinable suggestion of regret and mourning—regret for the death of Summer, and mourning for the birth of Winter.

The trees reluctantly cast their garments from them—the last remnants of their yearly trousseaux—and watched them circle lightly to the ground, where they fluttered crisply among their mates of yesterday. The sun, a crimson disc of fire, shone valiantly in a sky of grey, while a young thrush lifted up its voice in a song heralding winter.

Muriel Maitland raised her head and inhaled a long breath. She herself might have been a young wood-nymph, for from her toque of pheasants' wings to the dainty tan shoes on her feet she embraced all the many hues of autumn; and in a buttonhole of her brown coat was a leaf of golden red, while in her hand was a bunch of the same foliage. She rustled her feet through the drift of leaves lying thick on the ground, then turned reluctantly towards the Manor.

"I love to be out on a morning like this," she sighed. "These dear old acres of wood and field lying round the Manor are a source of undying pleasure to me! But I must go in now, or I shall be late."

She slowly crossed the lawn, opened the long French window, and stepped into the dining-room of Maitland Manor.

By the fireplace a boy was standing, gazing moodily into the glowing grate. He had a pale, aristocratic face, clear cut like that of a cameo, and a tangle of warm brown hair swept over his wide brow. His eyes were dark, and had blue rings round them, and his mouth had the discontented droop commonly seen in a delicate, spoilt child.

"Hallo, Woolf!" said Muriel, going towards him quickly, and drawing him to her, "what are you dreaming about?"

"I was not dreaming," the boy replied slowly. "I was remembering something that happened last night when I was in bed."

Muriel laughed. She was very fond of her old-fashioned little step-brother, and his quaint mannerisms always amused her.

"Tell me what it was."

"Someone came into my room," he said gravely; "and at first I was frightened and shut my eyes tight. Then a sound like a kiss fell on my pillow, and a voice seemed to wail, 'All these years and no sign; God grant I may keep him!' Then there was silence in the room," the boy went on gravely, "and when I opened my eyes it was just the same as usual, only violets seemed to be near me—like mother's scent, you know."

"That was a funny dream," said Muriel absently.

She remembered that she had not seen her step-mother that morning, and she took up the great cluster of autumn foliage and moved towards the door.

Outside the boudoir she paused, then tapped lightly at the door.

"May I come in?"

A low voice answered her, and Muriel was in the presence of her step-mother.

In a deep, luxurious chair, drawn up close to a roaring fire, a woman was sitting. Her face was that of a girl in her early twenties, round and dimpled; her red-gold hair was elaborately dressed, and in the deep-set eyes there was a gleam of something that haunted—apart from the beauty of them. The scarlet lips, revealing dazzling white teeth, were classic in their severe lines of beauty.

She looked up swiftly when Muriel entered.

"Dear, you bring a breath of wholesome winter into this heated room. I thought it was my boy!"

The girl laughed. "No, 'Mother o' Pearl,' it is not Woolf; only your natal comrade. See, here are some of your favourite leaves. A tiny gift, but acceptable, eh, Mother o' Pearl?"

She knelt down by the chair and stroked her step-mother's slim white hand. She had a great reverence for her father's lovely wife, and her girlish admiration was graciously acknowledged on her ladyship's part by an occasional lapse into sisterly converse.

"How young you look, 'Mother o' Pearl!'" she laughed. "I am eighteen to-day, and you are——" she stopped abruptly. There was something about Lady Maitland's manner that forbade a familiarity.

"While I am nearly twice that dreadful age!" her step-mother smiled sweetly. "Thirty-five, child; quite a comfortable, placid person."

Muriel laughed merrily. "I only hope I shall have the same aspect of comfort and placidity at your age, Mother o' Pearl! It is most becoming!" Then, with a sudden shy boldness, she said:

"You must have made a lovely widow before you married father! I can just imagine you in those black, clinging robes of mourning. Was—was he your first love?"

A strange expression flitted across the perfect face of Sir Trevor Maitland's wife, and the classic lips tightened suddenly into an ugly contortion. The kneeling girl did not see it, but she felt the hand she was holding tremble.

"How cold you are, Mother o' Pearl!" she said solicitously, lingering playfully on the pet name she had bestowed upon her father's wife. "Did you have a good night? Woolf had a dream about someone kissing his pillow. Perhaps you walked in your sleep!" she laughed.

Lady Maitland rose quickly, the long lace on her sleeve pulling a china vase off its pedestal, whence it fell with a loud crash into the fender. She started, and pushed her step-daughter from her with an irritable gesture.

"Dear, excuse me," she said apologetically. "But my nerves are all wrong to-day. Now you must hurry away; I have a lot to do before lunch, and your father wants to see me in the library. I have my present to receive," and with a brilliant smile she gently closed the door upon the girl.

Once alone, Lady Maitland stood thoughtfully gazing out of the window at the wooded expanse of scenery beyond. It was her habit to rarely appear among her family until the lunch gong sounded.

Domestic details did not trouble her, being in the capable hands of the housekeeper, Mrs. Janes, and Lady Maitland was too wise a woman of the world to wish to wrest the keys of authority from those who had held them before her advent. So she was consequently beloved and popular with everyone in Maitland Manor from the highest to the lowest, with the exception of—her elder step-daughter Agnes, who had held aloof from her since they had met fifteen years ago.

But it was not of Agnes that Lady Maitland was thinking. She had long since ignored her existence, after that first feverish desire to win the love of every creature with whom she came in contact.

"It is strange," she murmured; "the child is too open to have a secret motive in the background. But coming as her questions did on this day of all days they almost seemed like a foreshadowing of trouble. Perhaps I am overstrained and imaginative," she half laughed; "and after all what is there to fear? Absolutely nothing! The dead past has indeed buried its past only too well. And I have my boy—my Woolf—to live for; all the old links are dead."

She opened a tiny escritoire that was in one of the windows, and drew out from a secret drawer a paper, yellow and time-worn. What was written on it appeared to give her a sense of satisfaction, for she folded it up and replaced it with a smile on her proud mouth; then went downstairs to her husband's study.

* * * * * * *

Sir Trevor Maitland was a typical hunting squire, big, bluff, hale, and hearty; twice the age of his second wife, whom he regarded with almost adoring reverence, for her beauty had the effect of making him feel that he was in the presence of something he could not understand; that into the window of his life had been placed a sheet of stained glass, and the face of the saint looking down on him was that of his wife, Pearl.

"Well," she said brightly, settling herself gracefully into a low leather chair, "what is my present this time, Trevor? Am I to guess?"

Her husband touched her soft cheek tenderly.

"Darling wife! This is the fifteenth birthday of yours we have spent together, and I swear that you don't look a day older than on the first! It's I, the old crock, that has travelled down the road; you seem to have stopped at the first milestone!"

She laughed lightly. "Ah, Trevor, children are we women's milestones! I ceased to grow old when Woolf came. Then I went backwards and became a child again. But come, show me your gift; I am impatient."

"My dear," her husband began somewhat hesitatingly, "my gift to you this year is one that will surprise and, I hope, please you as well. I have given you jewels of every description on previous birthdays; but this time I propose giving you a jewel of another sort—a human jewel, my dear, that will grow dearer to us with each year. Can't you guess?"

Lady Maitland shook her head slowly; she was puzzled as to her husband's meaning.

"I am not good at guessing, Trevor. You had better tell me."

"It is this. It is fourteen years now since that child, 'Ivy Strange,' was found outside the Manor gates, and we have grown so fond of her that I propose legally adopting her—making her one of ourselves in fact."

He looked at his wife for a response, but her face was averted and he could only see her regular profile.

"Does my gift please you, sweetheart?"

She laughed disdainfully. "Well, I can hardly say it does, Trevor. I am not particularly fond of stray children. It is one thing to show them charity, but another to knit them to us irrevocably. The girl is very happy at the lodge, they are kind to her, and she is always up at the Manor, and makes a nice companion for Muriel.

"But," she went on impressively, "it would be a wrong to the girl to take her out of her station and put her among people socially her superior. Besides, why another daughter in the family? Surely you owe something to your own girls, Agnes and Muriel, to say nothing of your elder son, the heir, and—and——" her voice softened, "our son, Woolf?"

Sir Trevor Maitland shook his head. Like all rather weak natures he was obstinate where he made up his mind.

"You are not correct, my darling, in supposing that by adopting a child I should be wronging any of my other children. They are all well provided for under the will of their mother—my first wife. But I hoped you would welcome a daughter!" he finished, in a disappointed tone. "This is the first time you have ever refused a gift of mine, Pearl!"

"Forgive me, Trevor!" and one of her white hands rested on his shoulder with a caressing gesture. "It was just a little sudden, this proposal of yours. Personally, I desire no other child but Woolf; he is the pivot round which my life revolves. It is hardly to be wondered at that I should not hail with such delight the advent of another claim on your heart and purse! But I will think it over, dear," she added quickly, seeing a cloud on her husband's face. "Perhaps you are right and I am wrong!"

"That's it," said the Squire. "Now I have some news for you. It concerns Agnes."

"Agnes?" queried his wife curiously. "In what way?"

"Heriot North, the son of my old friend, Jim North, has written saying he has just returned from India, where he has been some years, and hints that he hopes he will have the pleasure of seeing Agnes, whom he remembered as a child; also, that if she is free, he wishes for my consent to pay his addresses to her."

Lady Maitland smiled. Agnes was just five years her junior, and looked at least as many years her senior. She wondered what manner of man he was who wished to make Agnes Maitland his wife. But Maitland Manor could spare her very well.

"That will be very nice—for Agnes," she said drily. "Have you seen her, or will you let the lover acquaint her with his intentions?"

Sir Trevor hesitated. "Well, my darling, I thought that you, a woman, would understand better how to put that sort of thing than myself. You see, I might make a mess of it, while you have so much tact."

Pearl Maitland laughed. "Very well, flatterer, I will go now, and you may trust me to find out in what direction Agnes' sentiments lie. When do you expect this Mr. North?"

"To dinner to-night," replied her husband. "I hope you will succeed, darling."

Outside the library door Lady Maitland stopped, and gripped the banister with one white hand. Her cream and pink skin had faded strangely, and her lips trembled.

"It shall not be!" she muttered. "I will see no beggar brat sharing my son's fortune. I wish I had insisted on the girl going to the workhouse when she was first found! Woolf has been cheated of becoming the heir because of his step-brother, but he shall not also be cheated of his money! I must get the girl out of the way; but how?"

SECOND CHAPTER.

A Link with the Past.

Agnes Maitland looked at herself in the glass. She was dressing, not only for dinner but for life—for the long-deferred right to take her place among the women that are helpmeets and mothers of men. She was just thirty; an age when an unmarried woman is neither flesh, fowl, nor good red herring! And now Heriot North, the man she had worshipped as a child, desired to make her his wife.

She could hardly believe it at first, when her cold, beautiful stepmother had suggested that she should wear the prettiest robe she had, and arrange her pale, sandy hair in the style most becoming, for at dinner that night she was the object of attraction to Mr. North! So she had chosen a blue silk dress, and loosened the scanty knot of hair at her neck, while the strands of untidy fringe had been curled!

She could not change the narrow, grey eyes, with their white lashes, nor reduce the flaming scarlet of her neck and arms to the satin creaminess of her stepmother's, but in a subdued light she would easily pass for five-and-twenty, and gratified vanity had softened the expression of her face.

"That will do, Mason," she said to the patient maid, who was adding little touches to her dress, "you can go."

The woman lingered. She had recently arrived at Maitland Manor, and was a sour-visaged but excellent menial.

"Excuse me, miss. May I make so bold as to ask you something?"

"Well," said Miss Maitland, "what is it, Mason?"

"Only this, miss," continued the monotonous voice. "In the box-room this morning, when I was emptying those old travelling trunks of the rubbish in them, I found something that I thought I ought to ask you about."

Sir Trevor Maitland's elder daughter raised her pale red brows and surveyed the expressionless face of her maid in the mirror. But she failed to read it.

"What was it?" she said shortly. "A book?"

"No, miss; only a pair of baby's socks and a little flannel vest," the woman answered. "I was throwing away a bundle of paper and they fell out."

"It is certainly odd, but nothing out of the way, Mason. There have been many nurses at Maitland Manor since those boxes were stored."

The woman shook her head.

"Excuse me, miss; those socks and vest were not of the kind worn by Master Woolf; they were common like."

Agnes shrugged her shoulders; the woman's persistence amused her.

"I am not interested in the subject, Mason; you had better throw them away, or give them to some child."

The maid tightened her lips. But she obeyed her orders sullenly, and finished her duties before leaving the room.

When the door had closed on her, she drew from her pocket something small and flimsy, and looked at it with a grim smile.

"She may not be interested," she muttered, with a jerk of her head in the direction of the room, "but I am, and I am not going to drop it. I mean to find out who it is that marked this vest with a 'G' and left it in her ladyship's box."

When Agnes went downstairs the drawing-room was empty save for Lady Maitland, and a pang of sharp envy shot through the girl as she saw the radiant, queen-like beauty of her step-mother. She was clad in white tulle, while in her shining hair and corsage there nestled lilies of the valley.

"She might be a bride of seventeen!" Agnes thought spitefully, her thin mouth growing hard; but she concealed her thoughts under a burst of insipid girlishness.

"Are none of the others down yet?" she said, seating herself on a couch facing a long mirror in which she could see who entered the room without being seen herself.

Lady Maitland smiled. She knew what was passing in her step-daughter's mind. "Muriel has been down, but went to see Woolf in the schoolroom, and as for Jack——" She shrugged her shoulders. "I have seen nothing of him all day. Probably you know more than I do."

Agnes sneered. "You mean Ivy Strange does! I meant to tell you to-day that I think someone ought to speak to father. His foundling will cost him more than he reckons one day!"

"My dear Agnes," laughed Lady Maitland, teasingly, "I never interfere unless personally annoyed. And I am not sure that the pretty waif your father has brought up with Muriel would not make a very charming Lady John Maitland in the future!"

Agnes started to her feet. "It seems to me," she said, bitterly, "that the male portion of the family has developed a passion for dragging 'nobodies' into it!"

A faint pink stained the pale face of her father's second wife, and the delicate nostrils dilated with some inner emotion. But Lady Maitland smiled sweetly upon her step-daughter.

"Perhaps you are right, Agnes, though," she added calmly, "the female portion of the family has been unfortunate in securing 'nobody' to drag them out of it."

At that moment the door opened, and Sir Trevor came in, accompanied by a tall, dark man with an eager, strenuous face, and a well-shaped, nervous mouth.

"Here is Agnes with my wife," Sir Trevor said heartily, waving his hand vaguely in the direction of the two women.

"My dearest," he turned to his wife, "this is Heriot North; my wife."

But the visitor had already stepped up to Lady Maitland, and taken her hand in his.

Agnes

"Agnes!" he exclaimed, "is this you? I never fancied you would grow up such a woman!"

A low laugh of amusement came from the lips of Sir Trevor's wife.

"I am sorry my white frock caused you to think I was your old friend, Mr. North. This is Agnes; I am Lady Maitland."

For an instant the man was at a loss to grasp the full meaning of the error he had made; then, quickly pulling himself together, he turned with a laugh of embarrassment to Sir Trevor and Agnes. The baronet was frowning with importance, but the face of his daughter had gone haggard and pinched.

"I always laughed when doctors warned me not to try my sight," Heriot North said easily, taking Agnes' cold, clammy hand in his, and gazing with a kindly glance into her old-young face; "but after my ridiculous mistake in not recognising you, Agnes, I shall have to take to glasses at once."

She laughed harshly. The newly-aroused feelings of tender womanhood, that had lain dormant in her until that day, died suddenly of strangled hope, and from that deathbed of hope there rose up a great, bitter hatred for her step-mother; for in the eyes of Heriot North, when he looked at Lady Maitland, she had read the words that were meant for herself. Her father's wife had robbed her of her birthright!

At dinner, where Heriot renewed his friendship with Muriel and Jack Maitland—the latter tall and fair, with laughing blue eyes and crisp, curling hair, and an infectious laugh—the conversation chanced to touch the profession of the guest.

"How do you like being on an Indian paper?" said Sir Trevor. "Harder work than an English one?"

Heriot North laughed. "Not so hard, but more interesting!" he said. "But it is eighteen years since I worked for an English paper, and then I was just beginning."

"What was it?" said Jack Maitland. "'Leaders' or 'turn overs'?"

"Nothing so classy," laughed the other. "I was a police court reporter, if you know what that means."

"You must have seen a great deal of the 'seamy side'?" Lady Maitland smiled.

"Yes, I did," he replied gravely, turning to her with a sudden flash in his sombre eyes. "I shall never forget reporting a case of forgery once."

Sir Trevor's beautiful wife smiled again. She had a rare smile of peculiar sweetness, that flickered in her eyes first, and gradually curved her haughty mouth, and sent dimples to dwell in her rounded cheeks.

"Was it very interesting?"

"Very! And the circumstances were peculiar too. The prisoner's friend prosecuted him. They had been collaborators together in a novel, so far as I can remember; friends since boyhood. The prisoner vowed he was innocent, and that his friend had asked him to present the cheque at his bank, as he had a bet with another man about it not being possible. Of course the defence was fearfully weak, and he got fifteen years' penal servitude."

Lady Maitland fastened a bracelet that had slipped from its catch. She was still smiling, but her delicate nostrils quivered slightly and the colour in her cheeks was a trifle paler.

"Was he a married man?" asked Agnes.

"Yes; on his honeymoon!" replied North, slowly. "I felt awfully sorry for the chap myself. I saw his wife on the day he was sentenced. She was coming out of the cell; been to say 'Good-bye,' to him, I suppose."

"What was she like?" asked Lady Maitland, slowly raising her head and looking into his eyes.

He hesitated. "It's eighteen years ago," he laughed, "rather difficult to remember. But one thing I never forgot, and that was the wonderful colour of her hair—a mixture of copper and brown; but by this time it is probably grey, or the poor soul is dead."

Lady Maitland uttered a stifled cry that turned all eyes on her.

"The—heat," she faltered; then suddenly Heriot North sprang to his feet in time to catch her in his arms.

Sir Trevor Maitland's wife had fainted.

THIRD CHAPTER.

The Child of Chance.

"If you love me, then our marriage is a foregone conclusion, and you must reconcile yourself to the idea of one day being 'Mrs. Jack Maitland.'"

The girl so addressed, with all a lover's dear authority, was

Sir Trevor Maitland's protégée, Ivy Strange, who, fourteen years ago, was found half buried under the ivy of the lodge walls, and the man who wooed her so confidently was Jack Maitland, the son and heir of that benevolent gentleman.

They had met in the wood, their usual place of rendezvous, and the old, old tale, so new and thrilling when heard the first time, had been poured into the delicate, shell-like ears of the girl who, but seventeen years of age, and a waif, held herself with as much grace and dignity as did the proud, haughty lady of the Manor herself.

She smiled wistfully into the ardent face of the man she loved, and for whom she felt her love ought not to be; but to know that he had told her that he wanted her to one day become his wife was a joy fraught with pain.

"Yes," she said gently, "I do love you. I seem to have loved you since I was a baby under the ivy long ago, and was roused from my strange resting-place by being picked up in your arms and taken up to the Manor."

"Then that proves that your love is my right," he said eagerly, trying to gaze into the violet eyes under their sweeping lashes, "for had I not been beating up the leaves with a stick you might never have been found, darling! I was even your god-father," he laughed, "for it was I who christened you 'Ivy Strange,' and thought it such a good name! And now," he continued tenderly, "like that 'ivy' you have twined yourself round my heart, and I cannot live without you! You have admitted your love for me; then why should you refuse mine?"

"Because," she said, turning tear-dimmed eyes upon him, "I must remember that there is a gaping chasm between us that can never be bridged over. You are the son and heir of Sir Trevor. I am the child of chance, brought up by the charity of your father! How can I repay him by such ingratitude as permitting his son to marry me!"

"But, darling," continued her lover passionately, "why do you make a difficulty of that? Anyone has only to look at you to see that you are a lady from the crown of your chestnut head to the soles of your tiny feet. And were your birth to be discovered, I know it would be unimpeachable. But I want you as you are, sweetheart—my little 'Ivy Strange'!"

"Ah," the girl breathed sadly, "that's it. I have no name but the dear one you bestowed upon me as a waif! No, Jack, however much it breaks my heart to say it, I must refuse to marry you until I know who I really am, and that seems impossible to find out after all these years!"

He took her hands and drew her towards him. He was only twenty-five, and she was his first love, whom he had always loved, and intended one day, when she was older, to win for his wife.

"Will you promise," he said slowly, "that no other man shall ever have your love, and that the only obstacle to becoming my wife is the uncertainty of your birth?"

She lifted up her eyes, and in their true, clear depths he knew there could be no double dealing. She was incapable of deceit, and coquetry was a word she but vaguely knew of.

"I promise," she said, a delicate colour staining her fair skin, "that I shall only love you all my life, and no one else, and that the mystery of my birth is the only barrier that prevents my becoming your—wife."

Slowly he bent his head, and their lips met in a lovers' kiss.

"That is a barrier that shall not exist much longer," he said decidedly, when she had disengaged herself somewhat shyly from his arms. "Let me see, you were a child of about three when I found you, darling. It ought not to be difficult to trace."

The girl clutched her lover's arm with eager fingers. "Oh, Jack, find me my mother! I want her! To feel a mother's protecting arms round me when in pain or trouble. Sometimes I envy Woolf; he is the apple of Lady Maitland's eye, and when I see them together it makes me want my own—my very own mother!"

Jack Maitland's honest blue eyes grew misty, but he put a protecting arm round the trembling girl, and said cheerfully,

"If she is alive, my darling, I promise to find her for you. I shall leave no stone unturned to win my wife!"[1]

"Ah!" she cried earnestly, "she is alive; I feel sure something would tell me if she were not. I would understand in some mysterious way were she dead to me!"

"Darling, I will find her, dead or alive. Then she will put your white hand in mine and say, 'Jack Maitland, take your wife!'"

"But first," she whispered gently, "you will say, 'Mother, take your child!'" Then, with a sudden, shy gesture, she raised her face to his.

"Kiss me, Jack, and when you find her tell her I have all the love of seventeen years saved up for her!"

"And what about me?" he said half jealously.

She blushed. "All the love of my life is yours from now and for ever! Now I must go back," she said, after a pause, in which they had gazed into each other's eyes; "come with me as far as the Manor gates."

As the lovers strolled through the wood carpeted by the swirling autumnal leaves, and made dark by the gaunt branches of the great trees as they swayed towards each other, stretching out long arms to the wind-driven sky, a man stealthily crept from behind a thicket and gazed after them.

He was a thick-set, coarse-looking creature, with a receding brow, from which the dark stubble of hair grew in irregular tufts; a sallow, dirty skin, with a blue haze round the bull-dog jaw, and a pair of cunning black eyes that squinted viciously did not enhance his appearance, while round his neck was twisted a dark red handkerchief, the rest of his attire being hidden by a long coat, stained and threadbare.

"So that is the young son up at the Manor!" he muttered, "and 'e spends 'is time spooning with a girl that calls 'erself a charity kid! I thought I 'ad the list of everyone at the Manor. That cove might be dangerous. If I 'ad found the girl alone I might 'ave got some coin or joolry to go on with. Just my luck!" he yawned, "if I don't touch lucky to-night I shall get on another crib."[2]

FOURTH CHAPTER.

At Bay!

It was twilight, that brief half hour between the lights when the pendulum of Time seems to stand still, and Life assumes the tender half tints of retrospection.

In the drawing-room of Maitland Manor the great log fire crackled and blazed, throwing deep shadows into the corners and touching with playful flickers the hidden gold in the hair of Lady Maitland and her son Woolf. She was looking exquisitely fragile in a soft clinging tea-gown, and as her white fingers caressed the head of the boy at her knee, a light shone in her eyes that was never there save when Woolf was near.

The room was full of that desultory chatter of people who meet frequently, and take no pains to entertain.

Heriot North had just arrived, and after greeting the various members of the family he sat down by Lady Maitland.

"Do you intend making a long stay at Melton, Mr. North?" she said. "I am afraid you will find it very hum-drum after——"

"After what?" he queried, dwelling on the beauty of her low brow and delicately-chiselled face that the firelight lent a strange pallor to. "The boredom and dreariness of an Indian station? No," he smiled, "I don't fancy that I shall miss India—now."

She smiled. "But when you return you will not go alone?"

He looked at her searchingly. Was this peerless woman laughing at him; or did she innocently stab him?

"I shall never marry," he said abruptly. "I don't think the Fates intend me to." Then he went on quickly. "You look pale, Lady Maitland; have you quite recovered from your unfortunate faint of last night?"[2]

She shivered, then laughed lightly. "Oh, yes, thanks. I can't stand the heat, and the room suddenly felt very hot."

"But you have never fainted before, mummie!" broke in the clear voice of the boy leaning against her knee. Lady Maitland's hand touched the curls that lay loosely on the white brow of her son.

"Ah, Woolf!" she laughed. "I am getting an old woman now!" Then she broke off suddenly, and said, "I think Agnes would like a chat with you, Mr. North, so go and pick up the threads of the past."

"You send me away?" he asked in a low voice.

Lady Maitland looked at him for a moment. She was thinking deeply, swiftly. This man must be her friend, and to make him appreciate her patronage, she could do nothing better than let him compare her with the elder daughter of Sir Trevor. So she raised her pencilled brows slightly, and said; "I think you had better go, Mr. North."

As he was rising to do her bidding Muriel came up to them. "Oh, Mother o' Pearl," she said eagerly; "what do you think? Three robberies have taken place this last week at different houses in the neighbourhood, so I warn you to be careful of your jewel-case! Ivy told me that one of the gamekeepers in the spinney saw a man lurking about this afternoon!"

Lady Maitland smiled. "And you imagine that on the strength of that appearance, Muriel, the Manor will be broken into at dead of night?"

"Oh, Mummie!" breathed Woolf, with dilated eyes, and flushed cheeks, "I hope they will come into my room; I have never seen a burglar!"

"Why do you girls call Lady Maitland 'Mother o' Pearl'?" said Heriot North to Agnes, as he joined her in the window-seat a few moments later.

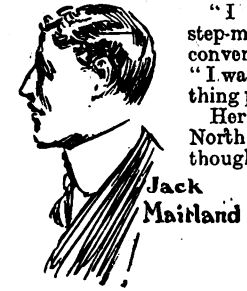
She looked at him with a bitter smile. "I think that is a fancy of Muriel's," she said slowly; "my step-mother's name is 'Pearl,' and Muriel invented that compromise—I call her 'Lady Maitland'!"

"She must have been a widow very young," he murmured thoughtfully.

"I know nothing about my step-mother's history," she replied shortly; "except that she was a Mrs. Vernon when my father married her."

Something in her voice warned Heriot North that she resented the introduction of Lady Maitland's name into the conversation, and remembering the object with which he had visited Maitland Manor the night before, he shuddered, for this thin, acid woman with the bitter eyes was not the fair, pretty child he had left behind him some years ago! Between her face and his another intervened; a perfect oval, with haughty, violet eyes, and a patrician mouth that a swift smile would suddenly change from coldness into warmth—the face of Sir Trevor Maitland's wife!

Agnes touched him sharply on the arm. "I beg your pardon," he stammered. "I am afraid I am hardly accustomed to the society of women now, after life in an Indian station."



"I only mentioned the fact that my step-mother seemed interested in your conversation last night," she said, slowly. "I was wondering whether there was anything particular that appealed to her!"

Her tone was significant, but Heriot North was too wrapped up in his own thoughts to notice anything out of the way.

"I do not flatter myself that Lady Maitland took more than ordinary notice of my conversation," he replied carelessly. Then, as Agnes was about to speak, interruption came in the shape of a servant with lights, and a note which he handed his mistress.

She looked at it curiously. It was in a strange hand, and bore the London postmark. She wondered from whom it came. She opened it quietly. The message was brief—of one sentence, but it was one that sent the red blood from her ladyship's lips, and a startled light into her eyes.

Lady Maitland went upstairs to dress for dinner.

The letter she had received was crushed into a ball in her hand, and when she reached her room she sent the maid away; she would dress herself.

With a sigh of relief she sank down on a chair. Her limbs were trembling, and she wanted to think—to think about the crumpled letter in her hand, the message of death that to her was life; for the last link was indeed buried in the grave—the grave of a man—"V. G. died a year after his release." That was all! She spread the letter out and pressed it to her lips passionately. Dead! That meant honour for her son Woolf, and safety for herself!

The faithful maid who had been true to her all these eighteen years, and followed her fortunes from afar, had done her the greatest of all acts in this cautious message. She hid it among her papers quickly. It was not safe to keep it about her.

Then after a while she rose and went into her dressing-room. The light had been switched on by her maid, and her dinner dress laid out; she would not be long getting into it.

Suddenly she stopped with a gasp of horror.

Standing in front of her dressing-table, that was littered with silver and jewels, was a man; he was not taking a single thing, but gazing intently into an open locket with eager eyes. She only noticed that he wore a dirty red handkerchief round his neck, and that his hair grew in ugly tufts on his brow.

"Who are you?" she said sharply. "What are you doing here?"

The man faced her with a sudden twist and an ugly scowl in his eyes that changed to a look of wonder as he saw the woman in her white, trailing skirts.

His hand sought his pocket swiftly, and gripped a long steel rod. Then as the beauty of the woman before him sank into his mind, he slowly glanced again at the open locket in his hand.

"If you don't speak I shall rouse the house," she said sharply, her hand going out to the bell-rope.

"Touch that bell, and you'll be more sorry than I shall!" said the man slowly, still gazing at her with an intent look of wonder.

"What do you mean?" she replied haughtily, dropping her hand at the sight of the thing the rogue held out menacingly; "I am Lady Maitland, and Sir Trevor Maitland is the Chief Constable of Melton. If you don't explain your presence in my room I shall immediately ring for help."

A strange smile flickered across the evil face of the intruder. He slowly returned to his pocket the "jemmy" in his hand, then said in an insolent tone:

"Now you 'ave introduced yourself, my lady, let me do the same. I am Mike Holland, ex-convict, and fellow-worker on the bog-land of Dartmoor with the gentleman in this 'ere locket along with yourself. 'E left before me, on licence, and we all knew that 'is lovely missis would 'ave nothing to do with 'im when 'e got 'is lagging, but I didn't know as I was to meet the lady under another name!" And an ugly leer curled his lips.

"Now will your ladyship ring and give me in charge?"

Lady Maitland put out one delicate hand and grasped the back of a chair with unconscious strength.

What was the creature saying? What hideous tale was he telling her about Dartmoor and—convicts! Was she mad—or was the man before her an escaped lunatic? Her eyes fell on the open locket in his hand, one of hammered gold, she had thought long since lost. Then she understood that it was no dream, and that the "thing" before her held a secret she had imagined buried in oblivion.

She drew a deep breath; she realised that she might mak one rash move, and so precipitate fate. She looked at the man standing with insolent assurance to hear her speak. The expression on his face lent her the courage of desperation.

She laughed softly. "It is unfortunate for you, my good man, that your tale should so barely miss the target of truth! That locket is the property of a dear friend who died some years ago. I am forced to make this explanation," she said haughtily, "in case you should attempt to resume the topic. I will give you the chance of getting away quietly at once, or I will keep my word and send for my servants and the police!"

For a moment her calm scorn floored the ex-convict, and he would have obeyed her had not a sudden light sprung into her ladyship's eyes as he was about to put the locket on the table.

"Ah-ha! my lady!" he sneered, "you are not quite smart enough; you can't bluff me with your fairy tales. This picture here is the very spit of yourself, colour and everything. And you are going to pay me for 'oldin' my tongue, or Sir Trevor Maitland will know that his wife is——"

"You madman! Be silent! How dare you—how dare you threaten me in that manner!" hissed the beautiful wife of Sir Trevor Maitland, whose lovely eyes had grown haggard and fierce.

"All right, my lady," said the man coolly; "give me in charge, and I fancy I shall see you in the dock as well. Thieving is not so bad a trade as—bigamy!" he whispered. "I am an old gaol-bird—quod is nothing to me—but your ladyship would find it difficult to swallow."

She put out her hand to the bell. The ex-convict's eyes were fixed upon her white, drawn face with a malicious grin, yet admiring her pluck in defying him.

Suddenly, above the beating of the woman's heart, a voice rang, a laughing, joyous note—the voice of her son Woolf, and her arm dropped by her side.

On his innocent head would the greater shame fall! On his name would the stain rest! She could not combat this horror, because of the boy outside.

The convict watched the struggle between pride and the mother love fighting for the victory, and he chuckled grimly, for he knew he had won the battle.

"Mother!" cried the boy, "the burglar has been seen in our grounds! They are searching for him now!"

"Well!" said the man in a low voice, the moisture standing in beads on his brow, "Choose, your ladyship, between silence—and the greater charge!"

She turned savagely on him, a cornered fury, her motherhood up in arms for the boy outside.

"Hide in there!" she breathed, hoarsely, pointing to a deep oak wardrobe; "I accept—silence!"

Noiselessly the man obeyed her, and the heavy swing door of the wide, old-fashioned wardrobe closed on the retreating figure as the boy Woolf Maitland ran into the room.

Lady Maitland caught him to her with a laugh that might have been a shriek, so shrill was the note.

"Darling!" she said, pressing her lips to his brow, and gazing over the tangled curls at the wardrobe, "you should not rush into my room like this. I ought to be very angry!"

The boy laughed. "But you are not, mummie, are you? Besides, the burglar is being searched for—I came to tell you." The woman shivered.

"But not in my room, I hope, Woolf," she smiled. "Probably the wretched creature had disappeared long before the search began. But come, darling, we must be going down, the dinner-gong will sound soon."

He nestled closer to her. "How scrumptious you look, mummie, dear! I am so glad that I am your little boy, and no one else's!"

Her arm tightened round him. "Yes, darling, you are mine—my very own, and no one can ever take you from me!" she exclaimed passionately, again sending a glance of mingled hate and fear over the boy's head.

With linked arms Lady Maitland and her son strolled to the door, then she paused suddenly and said—

"Wait here, sweetheart! I have forgotten something!"

She swept back into the room, and glided up to the heavy oak wardrobe, then, with a quick gesture, she raised her hand and silently turned the key in the lock, a strange smile of triumph quivering across her face.

"That will do it!" she murmured, and a few moments later Lady Maitland and her son went down the wide staircase, laughing and chatting as only those who understand and love can laugh.

Three hours later Lady Maitland stood alone in her dressing-room. She had again dismissed her maid, and, though the night was not cold, she shivered, and her beautiful face looked white and drawn. Her violet eyes, burning and brilliant, were fixed upon the wardrobe as though fascinated by its grim, dark appearance.

She dragged herself up to it with trembling limbs. What was behind that silent door, what "thing" would be revealed?

Suddenly she turned and secured herself against intrusion, then slowly, and with cold fingers, she drew from her pocket the key she had slipped into it three hours before.

A cold moisture broke out upon her brow, and she bit her exquisite lips in an agony of revulsion, as the key turned noiselessly in the lock of the wardrobe.

What would she see? What horror must she face?

With one look of terror, Lady Maitland flung open the door, and then caught her breath with a sudden gasp.

The wardrobe was empty!

(Another long instalment next week.)

Mrs. Brown: "How could you define 'tact'?" Mrs. Jones: "I should say tact is the ability to make your husband believe that he is having his own way."

Tom: "Women are taking away men's occupations. Why, they're even manufacturing furniture." Tim: "Yes, that's so. My wife makes a bed every morning."

He: "Yes, darling, and it shall be the purpose of my life to surround you with every comfort and to anticipate and gratify your every wish." She: "How good of you, Harry? And all on 28s. a week, too!"

"Doctor," said the grateful patient, seizing the physician's hand, "I shall never forget that to you I owe my life." "You exaggerate," returned the doctor mildly; "you owe me only for fifteen visits. That is the point which I hope you will not fail to remember."

Some time ago a cabby was accosted by a constable while driving through the City. "Didn't you see me put my hand up?" said the constable. "Well, I thought it became dark all at once, but I had as much as I could do to keep my horse from shying at yer feet!" was the cabby's smart retort.

"Take that mantle," said the shopman to his assistant, "and put it in the window with a ticket announcing that its price will be three guineas for this week only." "Supposing we don't sell it, shall I change the price next week?" "Certainly. We never deceive the public. Next week its price will be £3 15s."

A Scientific Wooing.

Telling of the Courtship of a Bashful Lover.

"IT comes to this," said Allen Locke, moodily. "I am in love with her, but she probably does not suspect it in the least. In fact, I feel positive that she doesn't! If I tried to—to—— Oh, well, woo her, to put it plainly!—she would probably laugh. So what am I to do?"

He had imagined himself alone, but a movement behind him arrested his attention, and made him turn with a guilty blush. He had unconsciously spoken aloud, and his innermost thoughts were thus confided to the new-comer.

He felt somewhat relieved to find that it was his sister who had entered, but he was not wholly at ease; Mary was a mischief-loving young woman, and she had often poked fun at him in a sisterly way on other subjects.

"So that's how the wind blows, Allen!" she cried. There was a suspicious twinkle in her eyes, but she bent over him and kissed him with an amount of warmth that surprised him. "I fancied that there was something wrong with you, as you were more than ordinarily quiet. I make a guess at her identity—Freda Rollinson!"

"Don't!" implored Allen. "Don't make fun of me!"

"You silly boy, I haven't the least intention!" declared Mary truthfully. "I am so happy myself that I want to see you happy. I came on purpose to tell you, Allen! I am engaged to Mr. Hutton!"

She blushed a rosy red at this confession, and proceeded hurriedly, without giving Allen time to offer his congratulations. "Now I want to help you! What can I do?"

Brother and sister were diametrically opposite in temperament. Allen was quiet and studious; like most men who take to reading, he was fond of solitude, shunning society, and consequently becoming awkward and bashful.

He was a thoroughly good-hearted fellow, capable of making a woman supremely happy, but scarcely likely to attract anyone of the fair sex.

Mary was fond of society, full of fun, and the life of any party of which she was a member; just as good-natured as her brother of whom she was very fond, and anxious to help all who needed assistance.

"Well, since you are in the same boat, only better off," said Allen slowly, with just the shadow of a smile on his lips, "I may as well confide in you. I am in love with Freda Rollinson, but I don't suppose she has given a thought to such a recluse as I. She has only seen me two or three times, when you dragged me out of my shell, Mary, to attend some of your parties!"

"Then if you want her, you must make her fall in love with you!" said Mary decisively. "We will call that point settled. I expect that is what Robert thought when he—when it occurred to him that he was fond of me."

"Y-e-s!" replied Allen doubtfully. "But Freda will not help me!"

"Which is a nice brotherly way of saying that I did some of the wooing with Robert," interjected Mary quickly. "And what if I did?" she added, with a pretty pout. "If a girl knows that a man is in love with her, and she is in love with him, why shouldn't she show it in a delicate sort of way? But that is not the subject in hand."

"No," laughed Allen. "So we will leave it, after I have said that I am not surprised at anyone falling in love with you, and we will get to my own affair. Mary, I accept your help. How shall we proceed?"

"Can you not strike a brilliant idea with all your learning? What are you studying now?"

"It is a book on telepathy. You know"—as Mary looked puzzled—"it is like this: You are a long way from me, and yet I know your feelings on certain subjects. I'll just explain by giving you an instance of telepathic communication that was published some time ago and is incorporated in this book.

"A man wanted to know the opinions of a certain prominent lady on an idea for improving the lot of people in small villages; this idea had been published, so the philanthropic lady had no doubt formed an opinion on it.

"He declared that he was able to sit down and write a summary of what she thought about it, without having seen her or communicated with her by speech or writing. In some mysterious manner her thoughts were conveyed to him by telepathic communication."

Mary's eyes twinkled.

"I can usually tell when Robert wishes to kiss me," she remarked with assumed demureness, "but I admit that the distance between us at those times is not great! But, joking apart," she continued eagerly, "that gives me an idea! You must make love by telepathic communication!"

"W-h-a-t?" gasped Allen slowly. "I don't understand!"

"Freda has been reading about thought-reading. This seems to me to be something like it. I'll set the affair in motion by telling her that you can divine the opinions of some people, and that I think her temperament is the sort you can do something of the kind with. See?

"She will be just anxious to test it; you will be placed in communication with her, and if you cannot work things so that she falls in love with you, quite legitimately, then you are not worthy to be a brother of mine!"

"No trickery! I must win her honestly?" declared Allen.

"Listen to me!" responded Mary decisively.

They spent some minutes in earnest conversation, and at its conclusion Allen was radiant.

The first move in the little comedy was made by Mary Young informing Freda Rollinson, with admirably assumed enthusiasm, that she had discovered that her brother could divine the ideas of certain other people.

"It's most wonderful!" she cried. "I mean the science of telegraphy—no, that isn't it! Telepathy, that's it! Of course, Allen is a mere novice, but he succeeds sometimes. I have taken the liberty of asking him to try with you. You know my brother? He is one of the best of fellows! I'm sorry for you, Freda, because you haven't a brother!"

"Yet you seem to have preferred someone else's brother to your own!" observed Freda, with quiet humour.

"Don't be personal!" exclaimed Mary, laughing. "I just teased him a little by telling him that he was too shy, too bashful, to write down his divination of a lady's opinions; and—just to have a game with him, you know—I insisted that he should write down your feelings on the subject of love! Poor boy! It was rather too bad of me! But he did it, and I've brought it here for you to see!"

Mary was discreetly ambiguous in the last remark, and

Freda understood the meaning to be that Allen was not aware that his words were to be shown to Miss Rollinson.

The latter, as watchful Mary noticed, was not altogether pleased at the experiment, but Allen's sister counted on being able to excite enough interest in Freda in order to induce her to become better acquainted with Allen.

The divination was short; it ran—

"The lady has not bestowed her affection on anyone yet; she has not met the man to whom her heart is attracted. Her feelings on this subject may be summed up thus: She will be exceedingly careful, almost calculatingly so, and will bestow her affections only when she has proved the man to be absolutely worthy."

If Freda had thought rather more deeply over the wording of this "divination," she would have seen that there was little more than guesswork in it.

Mary was still keenly observing her friend. She was almost certain that Freda had formed no attachment yet, but she was not quite sure of it, and she was a trifle anxious. Freda's face showed her that the guess was correct. Mary took a bold step; without waiting for a reply, she cried:

"It is true? I am so glad! It shows that there is something in this telegrammy—oh, dear! I can't remember the name of it! You must let my brother make another test!"

Freda was somewhat bewildered by the rapidity of Mary's moves; at first she had seen the difficulty of admitting to a man that her feelings had been correctly stated, but she found herself swept along as it were by Mary's rushing disposition, and before she knew it Mary had arranged the whole thing, and she was pledged to receive other "telepathic" communications.

"I have scored this time!" murmured Mary Young, as she made her way home. "That will set her thinking about Allen; she will be expecting other telees—I think that's a good word for them!—and if a woman expects to meet or hear from a man, why she is beginning to fall in love with him!

"Allen can go in and win now, for he's a really good old fellow, and Freda is sure to like him. He ought to make me a handsome wedding present!"

However, to her dismay, Allen would not face Miss Rollinson.

"It is too soon!" he expostulated weakly. "I have nothing to warrant the supposition that she would regard me favourably. I suppose it is very weak of me, but I'm so dreadfully nervous and sensitive that I can't risk it till I feel more sure that she likes me!"

It was therefore necessary that the so-called telepathic experiments should be continued; Allen scarcely approved the further prosecution of the plan, which appeared rather like deceit, but it was his only chance, and he plunged recklessly into it.

"I am dreadfully sorry, Freda," said Miss Young, a week later, "but my brother has not written another message yet. He says that there has been a change in your feelings on one particular subject, but he is diffident about writing it. The tiresome man wouldn't even tell me exactly what he had learnt. Shall I tell him that you are interested and would like to test the accuracy of this strange, unconscious communication?"

Now, Freda was but mortal, and any mortal would be curious in such circumstances. Mary made the thing so natural in appearance that Freda lost the sentiment that it was rather uncommon to enter into such an experiment as this.

She laughed, with the least trace of confusion, and said that she had no desire to press Mr. Young to do it if he did not wish to. So Mary went home with a light heart, and on the next day, she took with her the following divination:

"Part of the previous statement, if penned to-day, would be incorrect, as circumstances have wrought a slight change. There is interest, growing interest, in someone."

"That is all I could get him to write!" cried Mary. "Is it not tantalising—for me, for you know who this someone is! He ought to have said the name; then it would have been more genuine. As it is, I don't believe—— Why, Freda, you're blushing! Then it is true!"

"You must not tell him!" cried Freda quickly.

"I won't breathe a word! Who is it? Oh, if you want to keep it secret, I won't thwart your desires! Then all I can do now is to tell Allen to send you a statement once now and again. Give it to me? All right, but I ought to be let into the secret!"

Mary's remarks on reaching home were to the point.

"I must not tell you whether your last guess is correct or not, Allen, but I am convinced of the success of my plan! I told you that it would excite interest, make her think of you more and more, get curious, imagine that one who could tell what her views and sentiments were must be the man intended for her—her affinity. Your plan now is to write two or three more messages and then see her!"

Love-making by telepathy was proving a grand success. Mary decided to take no more active part in future operations than to deliver the messages and notice the effect.

Freda began to take great interest in Allen Young, quite unconsciously at first, but afterwards she recognised the true state of her feelings and did not attempt to illude herself. Some mysterious power seemed to be drawing them together.

She received two more messages; they were to the effect that her feelings were becoming more intense and that she wished for the society of the someone. She avowed the truth of this to herself, and she wondered if the man who penned these slips experienced any desire to be in her society.

If there were anything in the science, or theory, he ought to be attracted to her, even unconsciously. Then a great dread seized her—could he by any chance learn that she loved him? No; it was not exactly love, but—— Then she refused to pursue the thought farther.

The day following the last message she saw Allen unexpectedly. He had perceived that the time had come for something more definite than telepathy, and his great love had at length enabled him to master his timidity. Candidly, he was a little ashamed of it!

He took the opportunity of escorting his sister in the stead of Robert Hutton, who had been called away suddenly. There he saw Freda Rollinson, to whom he needed no formal introduction, that formality having been performed before the commencement of the mysterious semi-correspondence.

"I am afraid I have been very unconventional, Miss Rollinson," he said politely and frankly. "I hope I have not offended you by——"

"Not at all, Mr. Young," she replied quickly. "I was much interested."

They were close to a quiet corner. Mary was chatting in an animated manner with some friends. Allen drew Miss Rollinson farther into the nook and begged her to be seated.

"I am glad that I have been able to enlist your interest in an occult science, Miss Rollinson," he said earnestly, "and once more I must ask you to pardon my presumption. I take the liberty of saying that the experiment afforded me great pleasure."

"It seems very wonderful," responded Freda affably. "I find it rather difficult to believe."

"I do not," rejoined Allen. "It does not appear to me to be anything marvellous that there should be some mystic sentiment affecting two persons, and even if those two persons are strangers and have the same object in view, even then, I say, the thought of one may act upon the other. But, in the present instance, I prefer to think that the connecting wave or sentiment was something deeper than a mere thought on the same subject."

Freda shot a swift glance at him from the corner of her eye.

"I do not think that there could be any deeper sentiment, such as you mention, in the present case. We were not strangers, it is true, but we were next to strangers. Then I should hardly call that a fair specimen of telepathy where a common sentiment—it must be affection, in fact—attracts two people and draws them together."

"Perhaps the sentiment—— Oh, never mind the occult sciences!" he cried, in a very unstudentlike tone. "There is a science which no one has ever properly fathomed yet. It is the science of love, Miss Rollinson—Freda! May I hope that you will permit me to give you some lessons in that?"

It was a sudden declaration, and Freda caught herself wondering vaguely why she was not surprised. For some reason which she could not explain to herself she was not astonished.

"Perhaps you would not find me an apt pupil!" she retorted, looking at him with a mischievous boldness which reminded him of his sister. "And I am not sure that you can teach!"

"I am positive about it!" he replied promptly. "And I think you could learn if you tried!"

He tried to take her hand, but she placed them behind her. This action, of itself, would have meant a rebuff, but the expression on her face belied it. With an alertness that was surprising in him, he saw his opportunity and bent forward quickly to kiss her while she was, so to speak, off guard.

She sprang to her feet just in time to avoid it, and laughed merrily.

"It was my intention to keep you at your distance by not allowing you to take my hand till you had shown some capacity as a teacher, but I see now that you lose no opportunities. I ought to make progress under such a professor! We shall see! Now I have something to confess, and perhaps you have too!"

She seated herself once more. He took her hand and pressed it, waiting for her to speak.

"It was you I wished to see, although you did not say that in your telepathic message! Why? Because I saw something in it; I read between the lines; and, in some way, I—I wanted to see you, Allen! And do you know what it was that I read between the lines? Come, it is your turn to confess!"

He looked startled for a moment; then said slowly:

"Did I give myself away!"

"I guessed it after the second message!" she said emphatically. "I lost faith in mysterious sciences after that! I was on the point of sending a telepathic message to you, but something inexplicable took possession of me and I did not."

"That was love!" said Allen dictatorily. "And that relieves me, for it proves that you are not angry with me for my device."

"Why did you not approach me in person?" asked Freda with quizzical shyness.

"Because I am not accustomed to ladies' society, and because I feared that my case was not hopeful and I dreaded a rebuff in person. But you will have no further cause for complaint on that score!" he assured her. "Quite the contrary; it will be difficult for me to keep away from you!"

He caught her in his arms and was about to press his lips to hers when Mary appeared.

"I say, when——" she began; but, on grasping the situation, she continued airily, and not at all nonplussed: "Oh, go on! Don't mind me! I've been along that path myself!"

And Allen took her at her word and kissed Freda boldly in front of his sister; which demonstrated quite clearly that he was becoming accustomed to the society of the fair sex.

T. G. Orford.

The Third Quarrel at Laburnum Villa.

The diligent reader of Short Stories will remember that at the christening of Gerald Sinclair, the first son (hereinafter called "Toddles") of Gerald and Ethel Sinclair, the second big quarrel of their married life took place. It behoves me now to set down the history of their third quarrel as a warning to young husbands and wives.

It was the first week in January, and the weather was endeavouring to act up to its wintry reputation.

Inside the drawing-room at Laburnum Villa, though, it was very cosy. The blinds were drawn close, and a cheerful fire was burning, with just that suggestion of frost which makes a fire look comfortable always.

It was Friday evening, and Gerald was looking the picture of sublime happiness as he sat contentedly sucking at his pipe, as also did Toddles upstairs in his cot also contentedly sucking his own particular pipe.

Mrs. Sinclair only allowed her husband to smoke his pipe in the drawing-room one night a week, and that night was generally Friday. In consequence Gerald doted on Friday nights, and his wife said that it was the Thursday after before the room was sweet again.

"Gerald!"

Mrs. Sinclair had spoken, but the object of her speech being lost in the latest popular novel, heard her not.

"Gerald!!"

Mrs. Sinclair spoke a little louder this time, but still with no effect on her husband.

"Are you going to listen to me, Gerald, or not?" Her voice rose almost to a shriek.

"Eh?—What? H'm! Yes! Er—that is, did you speak, dear?"

"Oh, no! How foolish of you, Gerald, asking me if I spoke. Why I've been screaming at you for a quarter of an hour."

"Phew!"

"What did you say, Gerald?"

"Nothing, dear."

"Then don't. You're always cross when you've got that wretched old pipe between your teeth; I—I wonder almost that you didn't marry a pipe."

"They can't talk, at any rate!" growled Gerald under his breath.

"I was silly ever to agree to your smoking a pipe in the drawing-room; very silly indeed!"

"Yes, dear." But the "oil on troubled waters part" did not sit well on Gerald.

"Why do you say 'Yes, dear,' when you know you don't mean it? I've a good mind to put my foot down and say that there shall be no smoking in the drawing-room at all."

At this dire threat Gerald retired from the argument and picked up his book again. In justice to Mrs. Sinclair I must state that she had been suffering with an aching tooth since the previous evening, and was somewhat irritable in consequence.

Presently a sniff came from Mrs. Sinclair, and then her handkerchief came out. "I hope (sniff) if Toddles (sniff) ever marries (sniff) he'll treat his wife (sniff) better than his father does (very big sniff)!"

Crash! The book was on the floor, and Gerald was by his wife's side, and his arms were round her—but I will not, of course, go into details.

About twenty minutes later on peace sat enthroned in the Sinclair household, and Ethel sat enthroned on her husband's knee.

"Gerald, dear."

"Yes, girlie."

"What I wanted to speak about was this. You know we proved I had a head for business?"

"Yes," Gerald managed to articulate, but he groaned inwardly.

"Well, I've been thinking that we aren't business-like enough! There's a lot of waste goes on which shouldn't. Now look at the money you waste each week on smoking; still, we'll pass that over. But this is the point—see how much your tailor and hosier charge you; I'm sure you could get good things for a lot less than you pay. Then you're dreadfully extravagant with boots, too. Aren't you?"

"Yes, dear"—Gerald had discovered by this time that it was always policy to agree with his wife—outwardly, at any rate. This is one of the golden rules of matrimony.

"Now, this is what I propose. That we keep each other's accounts. I'll buy and choose your things, and you can buy mine."

"And choose yours, too, of course?"

"Oh, no, Gerald, you couldn't choose my hats and dresses."

"All right, then; you don't choose mine."

"But I meant to."

"Well, then, I'll choose yours."

Ethel sat and pondered for some time, and then, seeing any other course would mean unconditional surrender all along the line, gave in.

Thus it was that Ethel Sinclair commenced an account-book headed "Gerald Sinclair, Esq.," and her husband did vice versâ.

It was three days after this decision that Gerald said: "I must be getting some fresh ties; I'll give Blenkinsop an order for some." Blenkinsop was his hosier.

"But you mustn't, Gerald; I'll buy your ties for you," insisted Ethel. "Don't you remember our agreement?"

Gerald gazed in blank astonishment.

"You surely haven't forgotten how we agreed to keep each other's accounts?" pouted Ethel.

"Oh, no, dear—er—of course not. Oh, no; whatever made you think I had?" answered the arch-hypocrite Gerald.

"I should hope not, because I have been to your tailor and chosen a new suit for you. He'd got your measurements, and I got such a pretty pattern. But, do you know, dear, I had quite a bother to get it, he said he did not make suits out of that cloth, but it looked so nice I asked him if he wouldn't do it. I only saw a little pattern, of course, dear, but it looked a perfect dream."

There reigned deathly silence when Ethel had finished, and then Gerald got up and departed out of the room.

When he was safely out of hearing he expressed his opinion on matters generally with a fluency and in a manner that would have done credit to an habitué of Billingsgate. Then a fiendish gleam came in his eye, and about half an hour afterwards he was on his way to his wife's dressmaker.

I omitted to mention that Mrs. Sinclair's dress allowance was £100 per annum, whilst Mr. Sinclair allowed himself £50 for a like period. Also, I omitted to mention that in this fresh agreement it had been agreed that each was to spend the other's quarter's allowance for them. Thus Gerald had £25 on the credit side for his wife, and Mrs. Sinclair had £12 10s. to dispose of on behalf of her husband.

When Gerald arrived home that night Mrs. Sinclair's first remarks after the usual salutations were to the effect that her husband's suit had arrived.

"What!" cried Gerald, "my suit arrived?"

"Yes," responded his wife.

"B-b-but I didn't try it on at all!" he spluttered.

"Oh!" said his wife in surprised tones. "Do men try on their own suits before they are finished? I thought they simply gave their measurements and the tailor made the suit. That was why he laughed, then, when I said he was to finish it straight off and send it home as it was a surprise. He said he thought it would be a surprise, and he didn't think I saw him laughing, but I did."

"Laughed, madam, I should imagine the man almost killed himself with amusement. I can see him shutting up his shop in order to laugh as much as he wanted!" stormed Gerald. "Now let me see this wonderful suit."

"Its upstairs on the bed, I didn't open it. You go up and put it on and I'll see how it fits."

In about two minutes' time there came a noise from above like the roaring of a bull, and then prodigious stamping of feet. This was accompanied with the yells of Toddles, who woke up and joined his parent in his song of wrath.

Mrs. Sinclair sat waiting impatiently and growing more nervous every minute until at last her husband entered.

Ethel screamed and held her hands up.

"Oh, Gerald!"

"This, madam," he replied, "is your doing."

There he stood in the centre of the room in a bright yellow suit with a scarlet check. He said nothing more for a time, and the silence grew agonising.

At last he spoke.

"I do not imagine, Mrs. Sinclair, that my tailor was romancing when he told you he did not make suits from this material as a rule, or that he was prevaricating when he said it would be a surprise. It is a surprise, but my heart is only normal, and for my health's sake let this be the last surprise of its kind. This cloth, madam, happens to be a waistcoat material only. I think if you've seen sufficient of your folly, I will go and garb myself as a civilised being," and with that he went.

Under these circumstances there was nothing left for Ethel but to weep, and this she did with right good will, until a knock on the door caused the tidal waters to cease. Then a maid entered with a large box.

"This has come for you, ma'am."

"For me, Blanche?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"All right, that will do. Stay a minute, though, are they waiting for an answer?"

"No, ma'am." And the maid withdrew.

"From Madame Blennerhatchet's," she muttered. "I've not ordered anything." And then, as is the correct thing with her sex, she did not open the box, but seemed to imagine that by gazing and wondering she would find out what was inside.

"What ever can it be?" she repeated time after time.

At last a happy inspiration struck her, she would open it. This she did, and there revealed to her eyes lay a winter costume of pale green cloth.

She stepped back a pace, and then once more inspected it. Yes it was that and no other. A coat and skirt in a pale green thick cloth.

"Gerald," she cried suddenly, as the idea struck her. "This is his doing, and green is about the only colour I can't wear. And the colour green it is. Ugh! it is quite bilious."

Just then Gerald entered the room, and his gloomy face cleared somewhat as he saw the open box and his wife's horrified expression.

"Like your dress, my dear?" he asked briskly. "I think it's a perfect dream."

"Brute!"

"What, you don't mean to say you don't like it? I thought it would be a lovely surprise."

"Beast!"

"Well, well, there's no pleasing a woman." And Gerald went out of the room, and rushing into the dining room, fell into an arm chair and laughed until the tears poured down his cheeks.

War reigned in Laburnum Villa that night, and in the morning both got up with colours still flying.

There were a few letters and a package for Gerald.

An unparliamentary ejaculation caused Mrs. Sinclair to look at her husband. He was gazing in blank, horror-struck amazement at the contents of the package he had opened. These same contents consisted of half-a-dozen our in-hand ties and half-a-dozen bow ties. To say they were brilliant would be doing them an injustice. They were fighting the rainbow for supremacy.

"More of your work, madam?" demanded Gerald, with a gloomy face.

"Yes, Gerald, I ordered those," chirrupped Mrs. Sinclair.

Gerald fixed a stony glance upon his wife.

"Need I have asked such a question, though? Would anyone but one of your sex choose ties with a pattern like these? I had better put on the suit you bought and one of these ties, and go out as an advertisement for Maypole Soap."

"And —and I'll wear that fright of a costume you b-bought and go as an advertisement for Sea Salt."

Gerald gazed at Ethel, with the result that the impending tears began to flow.

Then there was another interval and once more peace reigned.

"Seems to me this economising business-like idea of yours doesn't work, my dear," he remarked, as soon as his lips were free.

"It isn't exactly a success, is it, Gerald?"

"I think I'd better see your account-book, dear."

"I—I'm very sorry, Gerald, b-but I've exceeded your l-limit by ever so much."

"What," shrieked Gerald. "You've spent more than £12 10s. on those ties and that suit?"

"I don't know how it is, Gerald. I added it up twice and it came to £18 12s. 6d. each time."

"Good gracious! Why you must have been swindled all round. Let's have a look at it."

Ethel dived into three drawers, looked under the table, in the writing desk, on the mantelpiece, in the bookcase, in the sideboard, and eventually found it in her pocket.

Gerald grabbed it and began to examine it with stern face and set jaw.

Presently his face relaxed and a smile began to creep round the corners of his mouth. The smile broadened into a laugh, and the laugh developed into a perfect roar.

"Oh, Gerald, what have I done?" questioned his wife anxiously.

"The head for business. Jee-oopiter! The head for business!" he gasped, and began to shriek with laughter again.

And this was the account kept by Mrs. Sinclair:—

GERALD SINCLAIR, ESQ.

Cash paid to Mr. J. Swiffenheim, tailor, Piccadilly, on January 9
Cab to tailor		2	6
Tea		1	6

"Oh, the business-like economy of it," Gerald ejaculated through his tears of laughter. "Added in the date as pounds! Oh, I'm going to choke. And what about the lace collarette? I haven't worn that."

"No, Gerald; you see I shouldn't have seen it if I hadn't been going to your hosier's. And it was such a bargain—marked down from £1 8s."

"The economy of it—ye gods!"

And now all is as of yore at Laburnum Villa.

A FALSE ALARM.

How Mr. McSwat Showed His Bravery.

"WILLIAM! Hark!"

Mrs. McSwat sat straight up in bed and listened to a noise she seemed to hear downstairs.

"What is it, Lobelia?" inquired Mr. McSwat, drowsily.

"It sounds like somebody talking. Listen!"

Mr. McSwat listened. He, too, thought he heard something.

"I will see what it is," he said, speaking very loudly and moving very leisurely. "Don't be alarmed, Lobelia. We are well armed. Besides these two revolvers," he continued, in a high-pitched voice intended to terrify any unauthorised persons that might be in the house, "I have a heavy cane and a large glass paper-weight. Be calm, Lobelia!"

He crawled out of bed, collected his arsenal, and the procession moved downstairs in the following order: Mr. McSwat, with revolver in each hand, heavy cane under his arm, and paper-weight in pocket of his dressing-gown. Mrs. McSwat, ready to scream, with front hair in curl papers, lamp in one hand, and bottle of camphor in the other.

At the landing half-way down Mr. McSwat stopped.

"Lobelia," he observed sternly, "it will be necessary for you to go in front. You have the lamp. I will protect you." Mrs. McSwat took her place in front as directed, and the procession moved on again. At the foot of the stairs William stopped and took up a commanding position near the hat rack.

"Now, Lobelia, go ahead with the lamp into this room on the left. I will remain here to see if anybody rushes out. If anybody does rush out," he exclaimed, grinding his teeth in a manner horrible to hear, "I will put fourteen bullets through him, knock him down with this paper-weight, and break every bone in his body with this cane!"

Mrs. McSwat went into the room on the left and looked about.

"Do you see anything, Lobelia?" asked her husband, in a voice of thunder.

"No, William."

"Go through the other rooms," he roared, bracing himself firmly against the wall.

While William remained in the hall, armed to the teeth, pale with iron resolution and trembling with ungovernable ferocity, Lobelia explored all the rooms and came back.

"Did you see anything?" he demanded.

"Not a thing, William."

"Give me the lamp!"

He handed his weapons to Lobelia, took the lamp, and with dauntless bravery went through the rooms himself.

"It wasn't anything, Lobelia," he said, with extreme disgust. "You didn't hear anything or anybody!"

The procession moved up the stairway on the return trip.

"You must try to overcome this timidity of yours, Lobelia," said Mr. McSwat as he put down the lamp and relieved his wife of her load of deadly weapons. "If I hadn't been here to protect you," he grumbled, crawling back into bed, "you would have frightened yourself to death."

Cash Down. Cash Down. Cash Down.

1st Prize, £50. 2nd Prize, £25. 3rd Prize, £10.

And 25 Gramophones.

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Below will be found six paragraphs containing the buried names of Railway Stations in the United Kingdom (or words that sound the same as the names). You must write in the spaces given the names of the Railway Stations so indicated.

No word or part of a word may be used more than once in making up the name of a Railway Station. In the event of the name of a Railway Station occurring more than once in a sentence, it should be underlined and written down each time. In case of more than one person finding the same number of words for each or any sentence, those words containing the largest number of letters will have preference. No name of a Railway Station may be composed of a single letter, either standing by itself or taken from any word in the sentences.

When you have discovered the names of Railway Stations in the sentences, underline (in ink) the words which go to make up the names (or words that sound the same as the names) and then on the line underneath each sentence write (in ink) the correct names of the Railway Stations to be found in each.

All the names will be found in the Index to Railway Stations in the January edition of Bradshaw's Guide. Should you be unable to obtain a copy of this Guide, a reprint of the Index will be sent to you for three penny stamps on application to Bradshaw's Guide, 59 Fleet Street, London, E.C.; or Room Eight, SHORT STORIES, 17 and 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

The names of the Railway Stations consist of one word or two or more consecutive words, or consecutive parts of one word, or two or more consecutive words.

The first prize of £50 will be given to the Competitor who fills in the greatest number of railway stations under the conditions stated. The second prize of £25 will go to the person who fills in the next greatest number, and the other prizes will be awarded in the order of merit.

When you have filled in all the names you can find, cut out the list below and keep it by you. Don't on any account send it to us until the closing date is announced in SHORT STORIES. The eleventh list of sentences will appear next week.

In the event of a tie a further list (or, if necessary, several further lists) of sentences will be submitted to the tieing competitors until one wins the first prize outright.

EXAMPLE.

BY

WINIFRED GRAHAM.

THE evil fogs had faded away, and crisp, frosty weather replaced the gloom. The carriage windows were white with a bewildering ice pattern, as of foliage, and the friends welcomed each other cheerily.

Mr. Carter was groaning under the weight of an enormous turkey, which his wife had commissioned him to bring from Leadenhall Market.

"Got a large family party at home," he said apologetically, depositing his straw basket on the rack. "Three married daughters and a son just back from India."

Stourbridge, who was empty handed, blessed his bachelorhood.

"You are a regular 'Carter' Paterson, eh?" remarked Harford, looking round for appreciation of his pun.

"Cards?" suggested Stourbridge, drawing forth a pack.

"No, let's see these stories out, one apiece, I say," Mr. Carter declared, who was renowned for his bad luck at play.

"I will tell you about Jack Thorne," said Blount, "and his lively investigations into the realms of spiritualism; it is a genuine tale, and as the chief conspirator has joined the great majority, it cannot matter repeating it. Besides, now I come to think of it, you none of you know Thorne or his wife, who are at present living in America.

"Jack was young and impressionable in those days, he yearned to plunge into the fathomless depths of psychological research.

"It happened that he made the acquaintance of a man named Seyfang, through falling in love with his beautiful daughter, Olga. The father was white, haggard, and old, with piercing eyes and long grey hair. He professed to be a medium and made money by strange practices, which Olga declared brought no credit on their household. She never appeared at the séances, professing herself a rank unbeliever in spiritualism. The girl nevertheless was completely under her father's rule, and he was a strong-willed, magnetic creature, and strangely enough, though Seyfang refused to listen to Jack's suit, the poor fellow became one of his most ecstatic disciples.

"The manifestations produced by the medium had the strongest effect on Jack Thorne's mind. In his gloomy despair at the disapproval shown by Seyfang to his daughter's lover, he fell a ready victim to the medium's art.

"'You can't marry the girl,' Seyfang would say, his greedy eyes glittering, 'she is made for something better. Olga, a mere child, endowed with the blessed birthright of beauty, to be wantonly sacrificed to a man who could not even afford her a carriage! Look at me! I am poor, living on a power given me from above, I cannot leave her a fortune with which to keep you both in affluence. She is born to be rich, and with her face could purchase a wealthy husband to-morrow.'

"'But I have plenty to live on,' Jack vouchsafed, 'she would never want. Besides, she loves me—are her feelings nothing in the matter?'.

"'Tut, tut,' cried the old man, running his lean fingers through his greasy grey locks. 'There is Colonel Leith—a man of means, with a huge family estate in the North and a house in town. He worships the very ground that chit of a girl treads on, and why? Simply because she has eyelashes as long as from my nail to the thumb joint, because she knows how to smile, how to speak, walk, move. Nature made such women for wealth and luxury.'

"'But she loathes the very thought of Colonel Leith!'

"'Bah! don't talk to me—I am a man of the world, as well as a medium.'

"Jack buried his face in his hands, and ground his teeth.

"'Come to our meeting to-night—I feel the devils are in me, or the angels—I know not which—but I fancy something will happen.'

"'Yes,' replied Thorne, 'I'll come.'

"Then he dashed out of the room with bent head and drooping shoulders.

"Olga met him in the hall. She raised her great tear-dimmed eyes to his sorrowful face.

"'You have seen my father again,' she faltered; 'he is inexorable?'

"'So far, yes, and the worst of it is he makes me feel a brute for wanting you.'

"Olga smiled mournfully.

"'I shall be true to you always, Jack.'

"He took her in his arms.

"The old man was heard calling Olga over the stairs. Jack slipped silently away, while the girl obeyed the commanding voice.

"'Come here,' he said, motioning her into his study.

"Then he closed and locked the door. Olga watching him silently. She was terribly afraid of her father.

"'Listen to me, child,' he began. 'I am in a fix, you must help me out.'

"A look of resignment crossed her face.

"'What can I do?'

"She had the air of one accustomed to submit.

"'My accomplice has fallen ill. You must take her place. I have ten people—ten men—coming to-night. It means ten guineas, which I can ill afford to lose. We must give them something for their money; I have never been known to fail. Why are you staring so stupidly? What is there to gape at, pray?'

"Olga's eyes were starting out of her head; she was pale to the lips and trembling.

"She rose as with an effort, and confronted him.

"'Do you realise what you are asking of me?' she cried hoarsely, her slight frame quivering with emotion.

"'Perfectly. Is it such a great hardship for you? The work is short and simple.'

"'How dare you even suggest such a thing?' she continued, with increasing anger. 'To fool Jack—the man I love—who reverences and honours me. To hoodwink him.'

"Her voice shook, she reeled against the mantelpiece, giddy with the horror that possessed her.

"'Don't be an idiot,' retorted Mr. Seyfang. 'Sit down and keep cool.'

"'To begin with, father, it is robbery. I have kept your secret for years, despising you in my heart, abhorring the deceit—the sin! My mother believed in you; it was her religion, her stronghold, her all. When she saw the baseless fabric—discovered that you were a common swindler, a clever actor, perjuring your soul for gold—the shock killed her. She told me with her dying breath, for fear that I also might live in faith and be awakened. She felt the smarting pangs of disillusionment—the agony of finding her mortal god dethroned.'

"Indignation blazed in Olga's eyes.

"'Have you finished?' asked Mr. Seyfang, with a sneer.

"'Yes,' replied the girl, turning to the door. 'I have given you my answer; let me go.'

"But Mr. Seyfang slipped his wiry figure between Olga and the door-handle.

"He took out the key and put it into his pocket.

"'No nonsense, now!' he muttered, pulling her roughly by the arm and forcing her back into the chair. 'The séance cannot be postponed, and you will do as you are told.'

"He looked at her in a way that always made Olga's head swim, and her will feel weak and powerless under his gaze.

"'No one can recognise you in the dark, have no fear, and you need not speak. Only disguise yourself in the white shroud, and appear in the usual way.'

"Olga fancied the devil must have taken possession of her father, as he spoke in his even, calculating tones.

"'But——'

"He flicked her across the mouth with the back of his hand.

"'Do as I say, or you will suffer for it!'

"Olga gasped for breath.

"Mr. Seyfang rose on his toes, and towered over the cowering form of his daughter.

"She shrank back involuntarily.

"'You understand,' he said, 'you have got to obey.'

"'Yes, yes; only don't look at me.'

"The mesmeric power of his eyes frightened her far more than personal violence.

"He unlocked the door, opening it with a majestic air.

"'Good,' he answered, 'you can go.'

"Utterly petrified with horror and disgust Olga crept from his presence, still numbed by that awful soul-piercing gaze. She walked slowly up to her room, feeling her way by the banisters.

"She had borne frequent humiliations, but nothing so bitter as this.

"To be dragged down to her parent's level, and forced to assist in a fraud appalled Olga inexpressibly. She flung herself down on her bed, and cried aloud in her agony of self-abasement.

"The terrible fear of detection froze her blood; to play the hypocrite was gall and wormwood to the girl's sensitive and upright nature. At any rate she would not be the one to deceive Jack, Olga declared, and straightway wrote him a hurried letter with fingers that hardly could form the words, so violently did they shake from agitation.

"'For my sake stay away to-night. I can give you no reason, but only implore that you will respect my wishes. Believe me, this is no girl's fad, but deadly earnest. Ask me no questions when next we meet—I could not bear it. I am miserable and distracted; you can help me by stopping away.'

"Then she folded the sheet, sealed the envelope, and dispatched it by hand immediately.

"When Jack opened the letter he had just come in before starting, and had been thinking a good deal of the evening's séance throughout the day.

"He had all a Briton's horror of being deceived, and Olga's manner had more than once brought a shade of suspicion to his mind.

"Jack fancied that her lip curled occasionally in disdain when Mr. Seyfang conversed with him on supernatural topics. From the first she had resented his interest and excitement, though it was good for her father's pocket, Jack advertising the old man's power widely among his friends.

"Now this letter added to the vague suspicions torturing his breast.

"He read it three or four times, then folded the letter tenderly, and laid it upon his heart.

"'Dear little girl,' he thought. 'It is hard not to comply with her wishes. But it is a duty I owe to myself and my fellows to sift this matter thoroughly. If we are being tricked by a plausible scoundrel the sooner he is shown up the better. We shall see if he then refuses his daughter's hand to an honest man who will only live to make her happy.'

"Jack's blood was up, for he scented treachery, and going to a drawer of his desk he took something out of a case and hid it away in his coat pocket.

"Then he went to Mr. Seyfang's house with a set purpose and resolution.

"The old man received his visitors cordially. He was in evening dress, and looked thinner and keener than ever. His eyes had a sinister light in their lurid depths. He smiled curiously as he took Jack Thorne's icy hand.

"'How cold you are, my dear fellow, and early too. We expect five more gentlemen for our sitting.'

"Jack addressed him in an undertone.

"'Might I see Olga, then, for a few moments before we commence?' he pleaded.

"Mr. Seyfang drew in his lips and shook his head.

"'Certainly not, Mr Thorne. The girl is foolish enough already, without being made more so. The less frequently you meet the better.'

"'Is she well?'

"'Yes, yes. Did you imagine she would sicken and die since the morning. Love is not a very killing complaint.'

"Jack turned

away to conceal his disappointment and vexation. He felt a deep-rooted hatred spring to life in his heart against the white-faced man, who was looked up to with such awe and admiration by his own clientèle.

"He glanced round at the men assembled, they certainly were not an attractive crew. Jack began to wonder how he could have sunk to their level. They were all more or less pale, weary-looking individuals, some tired and blasé with much dissipation, over-dining, and over-drinking. They craved a new sensation, and sought it at the hand of the magnetic Seyfang.

"'I wonder if he mesmerises us all,' thought Jack, for the storm of doubt raged within him—a perfect tempest of suspicion. Seyfang's eyes were powerful enough in all conscience; he could imagine them subduing a wild beast, terrifying a child, fascinating a woman, ruining a man. There was young Blake, who had neglected his business and lost his position in Lehmann's firm, through his dreaming and gradual brain decay. He had sworn by Seyfang, and spent his last penny in publishing a book on the great medium's occult experiences.

"The work had been written down, and sold badly, its only mission being that of enticing a few more shoals of prey into Seyfang's net.

"'Do you think my wife will materialise to-night?' asked a quavering voice of Seyfang, at Jack's elbow.

"The speaker, an emaciated man of thirty, prematurely grey and careworn, clutched a chair for support as he spoke.

"The medium smiled in his sarcastic superior way.

"'How can I possibly tell? While in the trance I know and see nothing, all my senses are controlled by a greater force than any natural power. I believe my body is actually dead for the time being, I am (to speak anomalously) a living corpse.'

"'How horrible!' muttered the man, shuddering. 'Why do we wait?'

"He began to pace the room impatiently.

"'Calcutt and Montennis are expected. I said eight o'clock. We cannot commence till then. You are in a highly nervous condition, I should fancy, from your appearance.'

"'Yes. Could you give me a brandy-and-soda? I am awfully run down, low, and unhinged!'

"'Afterwards,' replied Seyfang; 'if you drink before, people are apt to say what is untrue, and doubt the reality of our experiments. We cannot be too careful.'

"'You mean they would say I was drunk?'

"'Yes,' replied Seyfang firmly.

"'I have not been the same man since the wife died. If I could look on her face again, or feel the touch of her hand, it might save me from perdition.'

"'If you are content to wait and persevere it will come,' Seyfang assured him confidently. 'Only have faith, patience, courage; miracles are not worked in a day.'

"The poor fellow sank on a chair with a sigh.

"'I ought to be a good subject, in touch with the Unseen; I am not long for this world if medical knowledge counts for anything.'

"'Who is that man—the widower?' asked Thorne of a friend.

"'Whitehurst, a good-for-nothing creature, who has ruined his constitution with spirits of both kinds. He took to it after his wife's death. She was a beautiful woman.'

"'A brace of telegrams,' announced Mr. Seyfang; 'one from Montennis, to say that he and the two friends he was bringing are prevented joining us to-night, and another from Calcutt: "Down with the plague," which means influenza; it's raging in his neighbourhood. That cuts us off four sitters. The sixth gentleman has evidently fought shy of the fog which is thickening, and being now ten minutes past eight, I think our séance should commence. Alas! that we are only five. Gentlemen, pray follow me to the inner room.'

"They rose and filed solemnly, one by one, through the heavy curtains he drew aside. The partially-dark apartment had an air of mystery; they pushed their chairs to the table, and seated themselves in silence, Mr. Seyfang at the head. His face was in gloom, the lights seemed to sink and grow less; they were almost in total darkness now.

"Hands were joined, and silence reigned. Only the chattering of Whitehurst's teeth broke the awful stillness of that ghostly chamber. Once or twice he muttered 'Sybil' under his breath, as though calling on his departed wife. Strange lights like stars came fitfully, weirdly, on the walls; they flashed before the wondering faces and faded.

"Suddenly a weak voice moaned 'Aubrey,' and Whitehurst leapt to his feet like a man distraught. He flung up his arms wildly, and gazed into the shadows, shrieking: 'Sybil! Sybil! She touched me; her hand; I felt it here, here!' striking his breast.

"Then he tottered back with a groan, and fell prostrate on the floor.

"He rolled over in violent convulsions. The lights flared up, and the men gathered round, horrified, amazed.

"'He's in a fit,' said Thorne.

"A young doctor bent down and caught hold of him.

"'No, he isn't. Nerves and drink. I will take him home if you fellows will help me to get him downstairs and into a cab. He is a patient of my father. Thanks! Support him so and he will soon find his feet. I shall not come back as it's a three miles' drive. Look at Seyfang dead asleep, and livid to the lips. I have had enough of this awful place for a first sitting.'

"So the young doctor bore the unfortunate widower away in a state of mental and physical collapse.

"The three remaining men crept noiselessly back; the lights were low again, and Seyfang, who had just come round, asked what had happened.

"They briefly explained.

"He leant forward with a sigh. 'Intensely tiresome,' he said. 'It has spoilt one of our greatest chances.'

"'Try again!' they replied in chorus. 'The night is still young.'

"Mr. Seyfang agreed.

"'Perfect silence, if you please, gentlemen, and implicit faith. One unbeliever might ruin all.'

"Then he fell back once more in his huge oak chair, and closed his eyes.

"Jack felt his heart beating wildly. He vowed this night to prove everything.

"Seyfang had previously informed him that he hoped Miss Thorne, Jack's deceased sister, might appear. She had been close to him on two previous occasions, and once the medium declared he had seen her gazing through the ceiling straight down on her brother. Half an hour of silence and patience, and then the quickening of Jack Thorne's pulses, the expectation of something about to happen. Again a voice, low and muffled, speaking in the air.

"'John!'

"Jack's sister had always called him John from childhood.

"He covered his eyes with his hands.

"'Seyfang,' he whispered, suddenly unnerved. 'I can't stand it. I——'

"But the words died on his lips, as the shadowy figure of a girl gradually appeared.

"It was Olga, her face concealed in a gauzy veil, white and floating, her body shrouded in hanging garments, disguising it beyond recognition.

"In spite of her external placidity, as she rose through the ground on a trap-door behind her father's chair, ready to sink back at the slightest movement of his head, a sense of deadly shame oppressed her. She was sickened by the false proceedings, that filled her with unutterable contempt.

"As she stood in the gloom, swaying slightly in her painful agitation, a vehement desire for knowledge robbed her lover of sense and reason.

"Hardly knowing what he did, Jack Thorne sprang to his feet, drawing something sharply from his pocket.

"'Are you dead or alive?' he hissed. 'I will know, come what may.'

"A sharp report, the smell of gunpowder, the agonised cry of a woman, the heavy thud of a senseless body at Jack's feet, with long dishevelled hair stained by a crimson flood.

"In a moment he was bending over the girl, his revolver flung aside, the cold sweat of mortal agony and dread breaking out in the palms of his hand.

"He realised in a moment what had happened; he had been hounded to this crime by the sacrilege of playing with his dead sister's memory.

"He stared wildly down at the ashen features, his blood freezing in his veins, as he recognised the face of his beloved Olga.

"'Great Heavens! what have I done?'

"The old man had risen, grey to the lips, though his eyes flashed fire, as he beat his forehead with his fists.

"'Fiend! murderer!' he cried, 'you shall swing for this!'

"Jack Thorne, a moment since utterly paralysed, crushed to the very dust with hopeless remorse, now turned madly upon Seyfang.

"Springing at his throat, he seized him and shook him, till he was blue in the face.

"'You brute, you villain,' he cried, 'it is your doing. Your vile schemes have wrought this catastrophe!'

"Then he dropped him as if his touch were pollution.

"One man turned up the lights, while the other helped Jack to raise Olga.

"The hues of life flushed back, her limbs relaxed, and the girl they supposed dead, opened her eyes feebly, looking round as one bewildered in a dream.

"'She only fainted,' said one of the two strangers, 'and cut her head in the fall. It was a near shave.'

"Jack's relief was so great that for a moment he was speechless. There was a wild disorder in his thoughts—a tumult unappeasable.

"'Thank God!" he cried. 'She is saved.'

"Now he knew the reason for the desperate prayer of Olga's letter.

"Seyfang, suddenly grasping his precarious situation, turned appealingly to his three dupes, and gazed at them distractedly, with startled eyes.

"'I am in your hands, gentlemen, utterly and entirely,' he groaned.

"'Yes,' replied Thorne, 'at last! You have fooled us enough—obtained money by false pretences. But I'll show you up; and the public shall no longer be gulled by your devices.'

"Olga now rose, weak and feeble, but ethereally lovely, and clasped her hands in supplication. Tears moistened her sad blue eyes, through which her whole soul seemed shining.

"'For my sake,' she said, turning from one to the other, 'spare us the disgrace of an open revelation.'

"Her words amazed her lover, who knew well Seyfang's cruel treatment of his daughter, easily imagining the terrible pressure he had brought to bear in order to compel her to obey him.

"'I'll give it up for ever,' whined Seyfang, falling on his knees, 'to my dying day—I swear—I swear!'

"The two strangers turned to Jack.

"We would rather not be mixed up in this disgraceful affair. If we were idiots enough to come we should prefer to keep it dark.'

"But still Jack Thorne appeared unmoved, though he pressed Olga's hand reassuringly.

"'I would give anything for your promise of silence,' wailed Seyfang, noting the stony resolve on his features.

"'I take you at your word,' replied Jack Thorne.

"'And the price?'

"'The boon you denied me this morning.'

"The old man looked sharply across at his daughter. He dared not refuse.

THE tenth list of sentences in the competition will be found on page 687. Two more lists will appear.

I HOPE all my readers will peruse the first instalment of "THE BOND BETWEEN," our new serial. I can assure them that the story is well worth their closest attention. It is long since any work by a new writer has taken my fancy so much as Blanche Eardley's, and I hope that I shall soon hear from many of my readers that they agree with me.

THIS is decidedly an age of competitions, but a competition in which a human being is offered as a prize must lay claim to being a great novelty. Mr. P. Doubleyou, a well-known member of the staff of Pearson's Weekly, is the prize offered in a competition, of which full particulars are announced in the Whitsuntide number of that paper. I would advise all my lady readers who are in want of a husband to make sure of getting a copy of the issue of Pearson's Weekly for June 4th—on sale May 29th—which contains the necessary information as to how they may win the young man in question.

IN next week's SHORT STORIES, which will be the holiday week number, will commence a new competition in which the Index to Stations you already have will be required. It will not be a picture puzzle competition, nor a competition similar to the one already running, but something quite fresh. Tell your newsagent to reserve you a copy, so that you may be sure of having one. June 6th is the date, on sale Saturday, May 30th, instead of Tuesday, June 2nd.

WHILE you are making your plans to have a good time at Whitsuntide, I hope you will not forget those who are are not so fortunately situated. There are many dwellers in cities who never can go away for holidays. A large proportion of these are children, and it is for the children that the FRESH AIR FUND appeals. It only requires ninepence to pay the whole expenses of one child for a day in the country, including plenty to eat and drink.

I am sure that most of my readers could well afford to give away ninepence—some of them more—and I would ask one and all to send along just as much as ever they can spare that a record number of children's lives may be brightened this year. All contributions will be acknowledged in Pearson's Weekly, and should be sent to the Hon. Secretary, FRESH AIR FUND, Pearson's Buildings. Henrietta Street London, W.C. Collecting forms can be had on application.

THE PROFESSOR'S MISTAKE.

And the Happy Result that Followed it.

"What a blessed thing it is to be heart-whole and fancy free!" exclaimed Professor Johns as he stretched out his fine-built form to its full extent and stood gazing out of the window of his lodgings.

"Here I am, a man of forty, and have never experienced that poetical sensation called love, in consequence of which I may go where I will and have no one to drag after me; nor do I have to chide myself for having left someone at home.

"I am a bachelor, a thing for which I can never be sufficiently grateful. Now, after I am settled a bit, I will begin to write that new march and will not have to stop at every bar to answer some stupid question, or have my arm pushed hither and thither by the baby, as my friend James does, poor fellow! I simply pity him. He has genius, but he has a wife and child also, and those two absurdities would kill any genius!

"How any man can become so foolish as to allow love to overbalance him is past my comprehension! Yet there are few who do not."

He turned away from the window and began to unpack his bag with as much care as a woman might have used. His task completed, he strolled back to the window, where he stood looking out. On the house directly opposite, his gaze became riveted. Seated at the window was a young person whose golden locks and beautiful complexion reminded him more of a picture than of anything human.

This individual was totally oblivious of the professor's interest, and seemed to see nothing but the work upon which she was engaged. Now and then the ringleted head would be rested upon a slender white hand, to be raised again in a short while as though seeking thoughts from the heavens.

The professor stood gazing at this fair young face as if spellbound, until awakened from his comatose state by his host's invitation to the evening meal.

Next morning Professor Johns got out his materials, and settled himself to work, but, happening to raise his eyes, met a pair of very serious blue ones contemplating him from the other side of the street. To his surprise, and, we think pleasure, the golden head of his neighbour gave a friendly nod, and was immediately lowered over its task.

Thus it continued for several days, and, although the professor had no wife or children to stop him at his work, he had nevertheless made little progress in it at the end of the week. He determined not to sit near the window while composing.

This determination wrought little or no good, for at the end of another week, between walking to the window to look at the clouds, and thinking of golden heads and blue eyes, he had made less progress than during the week previous. So he decided to lay the march aside for a while. It was all well enough for men who had to drudge to do it, but that was not the case with him. He might lay his work aside until he felt more like finishing it.

Strolling past his landlord on his way out for a walk he inquired: "Who are our neighbours across the way?"

"Snoogles lives there," was the answer.

Great Heavens! To think that so beautiful a creature should have fallen heir to such a name, thought the professor.

"Their daughter seems to work very hard. What is her occupation?"

"Expect the gal's hands are full helping the old woman with her lodgers," answered the old man.

"They take in lodgers, then," said the professor, greatly relieved. The young person at the window was without doubt one of them.

"Do you happen to know the young person who generally sits at the window?"

"Snoogles says they have gone daft; do nothing day in and day out, but write music and play it!"

A musician, then, thought the professor, and small wonder that I should feel so drawn in that direction.

"Funny how some people waste their time," ventured the old man. The professor answered by a nod, passed out of the house, and down the street.

Returning, he was provoked to find his gaze riveted upon the worker at the window; also to note the pleasure with which he received that friendly nod. At the end of a month the professor had thoroughly studied his attitude towards the young person in the house opposite.

He was confident that he had become one of those fools who, having lost their heads, are willing to lose their liberty also. He decided to persuade the golden-headed student across the way to join her lot to his.

To prepare the way, he wrote, asking to be of service in what seemed to be a very troublesome part of the young musician's composition. His advances were met with a polite refusal, which ran thus—

"Dear Sir,—Many thanks for your proffered kindness, but I always make it a rule, when puzzled, to work it out by myself.

"Gabriel."

So her name was Gabriel—truly a beautiful name! To his dismay the professor found that his pen worked faster than his thoughts. He had positively written the name Gabriel more than a dozen times. This was developing more of the fool than he ever dreamt was in his nature.

In disgust he tore the paper into little bits, and tossed them from the window. Ye Fates! Raising his eyes he beheld the object of his thoughts sitting in her usual place, the slender hand resting against the golden head, and a perplexed look upon the young face.

This completely unbalanced the professor. He loved his young neighbour. There was no question about it. Why should he sit quietly by and allow each day to add to the toil of that young life when he possessed money enough to keep her in luxury, and knowledge enough of music to help her towards the goal of her ambition?

Should he be governed by that foolish idea which had ruled his former life, or by the promptings of his heart? It might be foolish, but he would do as his heart bade him. Drawing a chair towards his desk, he seated himself and penned these lines—

"My Dear Gabriel,—I have a favour to ask of you; a something which I have never before asked of anyone. Though an unusual manner of approaching a lady upon so serious a matter, believe me, it is with all due honour that I ask you to join your fortune with mine.—Very sincerely,

"Professor Johns."

If the professor could have seen the merry expression that shone in those blue eyes as their owner read this missive, he would have been even less happy as he awaited an answer. It arrived in due time, and ran thus—

"Professor Johns,—Will you kindly accept my sincere thanks, but Fate has not been kind; she has given me no fortune to join to yours.

"Gabriel."

The dear, sincere child, how could he succeed in making her understand? If only she would grant him a half-hour in which to explain! He was a determined man, so once more a note found its way to the house opposite.

Once more the blue eyes caught up their merry expression, and the following came back to the professor—

"My Dear Friend,—This love that you have expended upon me is a great mistake. Believe me, it has been misplaced.

"Gabriel."

Determined not to lose this precious treasure through what he deemed a young girl's shyness, the professor allowed a week to elapse before he made a very careful toilet one evening and betook himself to the house opposite. After a few moments he was shown into the dimly lighted room. Seated by the window was a little golden-haired figure clothed in black.

"I hope you will pardon this intrusion, dear Gabriel, but I could no longer stay away from you," said the professor.

The little lady in the chair rose and explained that she was not Gabriel, but Gabriel's sister!

Noting the confused look overspreading the professor's countenance, she hastened to explain that persons quite frequently mistook them from the window. Would not the professor await Gabriel's return? He had gone out, but would soon be back.

Professor Johns did wait, and between merry little stories and witty sayings from Gabriel's sister, found himself well paid for his visit. She incidentally mentioned that she had only arrived that day. It had been so lonely for poor Gabriel, who was such a student, and she had come to keep him company.

* * * * * *

The professor is married now to someone wonderfully like Gabriel. What is more, he does not seem to object to that someone dragging about after him or asking questions; and from certain scraps of information which have come to him, Gabriel feels assured that his sister has fallen heir to the best of husbands. Like a good boy, however, he keeps his secret fast locked in his own heart.

Alice A. Moran.

A Love Tangle.

Telling of a Doctor, His Maiden Aunt, and a Nurse.

"I will not have it!" declared the old lady positively. "If Mark takes up with a nurse, he loses the allowance I have provided for him, and he gets nothing when I am gone! A nurse, indeed! Here have I paid for his education, enabled him to study medicine, secured him an appointment in a large London hospital where he can gain experience, and offered to buy him a good practice when he is fully qualified, and he has the audacity to set his affections on a nurse! They are all designing creatures! Of course, she knows his prospects, and he is a weak simpleton!"

So Miss Frances Frenton, the maiden aunt of Mr. Mark Holland, the rising medical practitioner, wrote a severe letter to her nephew, which he received on the following morning.

"I call this an unwarrantable interference with my liberty!" cried Mark Holland, when he had finished the reading of the unpleasant communication. He was not without a spice of his aunt's quick temper, and the letter made him angry. "I admit that she has done a lot for me, but it is going too far when she threatens to cut me off because she has heard I intend to marry a nurse.

"Well, I cannot marry anyone just yet if she does so; on the other hand, I must give up the sweetest girl in the world for ever! No, I won't! I'll take my chances without aunt's money, and trust to my ability to make an income that will enable me to marry in three or four years, anyhow, and that will be better than giving her up for good. Besides, I am getting a little tired of Aunt Frances' dictatorial manner."

If he had reflected a little more he might have tried some plan that would have led to a compromise and even to reconciliation eventually; but that touch of quick temper spoilt the chance of compromise, and Miss Frances Frenton received, in turn, a note that made her compress her lips and alter her will.

It was very quickly observed in the hospital that Mark Holland's bearing towards Nurse Walton was changed, and none noticed it more quickly than Nurse Walton herself.

A cold chill struck her heart, and her face lost its happy expression, her cheeks lost their colour. Holland seemed desirous of avoiding her, and she attributed this change of demeanour to a change in his sentiments towards her.

With her hand pressed to her left side, she sat down to ask herself why she felt thus. Holland had not made any positive declaration; she could not say that he had given any absolute indication that he was in love with her; yet——

Ah, yes! Love can be expressed in so many ways without words, and she could recall so many acts, so many little things, to confirm her belief. And she had fallen in love with him!

Now he was throwing her over! For whom? She waited. Rumour is always busy, and it was not long before a whisper reached Madge Walton that Holland was behaving gallantly to Nurse Hoyle. Naturally, she saw nothing of this; if he were throwing her over, she would not see him paying attentions to another—not yet, at least.

Madge Walton surveyed herself sorrowfully in her mirror; she had been called handsome, and she was twenty-six, her beauty compared favourably with that of her rival, and their age was the same.

These two nurses had been regarded as beautiful and attractive; they were ideal nurses. Why should he have tired of one and passed her over in favour of another who was not her superior in any way?

"Men are fickle, they say! There is no other explanation, and I must suffer for my foolishness in thinking that he loved me!" she murmured, with just a trace of bitterness in her voice. She sank on to her knees by the side of her bed and sought comfort in tears.

Mr. Mark Holland's appointment at the hospital was advantageous for the practice it gave him, not on account of the salary atached to it. The remuneration was little more than nominal, so he had to seek work outside in order to live suitably.

He found employment as an assistant to one of the doctors, who had a large private practice, and was getting old, and this prevented him from spending so much time at the hospital as he had formerly done.

"I cannot speak to her yet!" he would say to himself. "A man cannot ask a woman to become his wife till he has something to offer, and I have next to nothing at present. Moreover, it is hardly fair to pay attentions to her; that might be depriving her of a better chance, which would be wrong, seeing that I cannot be certain that I shall have anything good to offer if she waits for me.

"Bother Aunt Frances! I don't think she has dealt fairly with me! I will keep Madge in view. I am half inclined to believe that Nurse Hoyle—Hm, I mustn't misjudge people but she has been very sweet lately!"

Mr. Mark Holland was disagreeably surprised one morning, on reaching the hospital, to learn that Nurse Walton had resigned; she had been gone several days, and her intention was to become a private nurse.

When safe from observation, he gnawed his moustache, and permitted a disconsolate expression to steal over his handsome features. He tried to find her address, but without success, and he lost, from that day, much of his geniality.

There was one man who could have given Holland the information he wanted, but that man was not asked, and remained silent. This was Dr. Miller, an elderly man, who had always taken a kindly interest in the orphan girl now known as Nurse Walton. She went to his private consulting-room in Harley Street and asked him to recommend her as a nurse.

"I am sorry you have left," he said pleasantly, "but I really think you will do better privately. Certainly! I shall have pleasure in recommending you, but you look ill yourself, and ought to have a rest!"

"I intend to have a week at the seaside, sir; then I shall be ready. I have been—upset—lately!"

"Yes," said Dr. Miller, in that peculiar way which suggests that the speaker knows all and yet leaves the hearer in doubt whether he knows anything or not.

A week later she appeared again, and Dr. Miller was able to give her a case which employed her for a month. She had not been free more than two days when he sent for her.

"An old friend of mine in the country has asked me to find him a born nurse, with proper training, for an awkward patient. This is a crochety old lady who has bronchitis and complications. She has money, so the engagement will be remunerative. I thought of you, but there is one little difficulty," said Dr. Miller. "That is," he went on, as she was about to speak, "the old lady is, I find, Miss Frenton.

"She has found out that her nephew, Mr. Mark Holland, whom we both know, intends to marry a hospital nurse, and she has cut him off. So," he added slowly, "it seems that he will not be able to marry Nurse Hoyle—as he is said to think of doing.

"Now, Miss Frenton is dead set against nurses on that account, which will give you trouble, and it is just possible that you might meet someone if she gets very bad and relents!"

Madge Walton was thankful to her old friend for pretending to be hunting for a letter. When he turned to her again, she was composed.

"I'll try it, sir!" she said quietly. "Perhaps I may be able to uproot Miss Frenton's prejudices. The honour of the profession is at stake, it would seem——"

"She thinks nurses are not ladies, but designing adventuresses!" interposed Miller quietly.

"If I can upset that notion, Mr. Holland might regain her favour, and have the opportunity of"—her voice faltered ever so slightly—"of marrying the woman of his choice!" concluded Madge bravely.

After her departure Dr. Miller uttered his thoughts aloud.

"Brave girl! It is surprising what a woman will do for the man she loves, although he may not have treated her well. I don't understand Holland's action. This is a queer move, and it will be interesting to see how it ends!"

The appearance of Nurse Walton in the residence of Miss Frances Frenton was a peculiar experience for the former. She found herself face to face with the arbitrary woman who had spoilt the prospects of the man she loved, although that love had, alas! been given unasked, as events had proved. This invalid was Mark's aunt, prejudiced against trained hospital nurses and ready to sacrifice the happiness of two young people for a whim.

Miss Frenton glared from the bed at the nurse; then she turned to her doctor and said, acidly: "I want a nurse!"

"I have brought you one!" retorted Dr. Wynne bluntly.

They had known each other for thirty years; he understood her peculiar ways, and treated her accordingly.

"This is Nurse Walton," he went on. "She is recommended to me by one of the finest doctors in the Metropolis, who guarantees her skill. What more can you desire, madam?"

"An older woman!" said the patient shortly. "These young nurses are all——"

A fit of coughing seized her. Madge stepped forward, raised her in bed, firmly and gently, and afterwards administered a restorative to the exhausted patient.

In spite of herself, Miss Frenton tacitly admitted that Nurse Walton was capable. The medical gentleman retired with a smile of satisfaction.

"You will have your work cut out, I am afraid," he said to the new nurse. "She is very ill and will be worse, and to cap all, she is very irritable and crochety. Nevertheless, I believe she is a good woman at heart. I am sure she has a soft spot in that portion of her organism if you can manage to find it."

"I'll try to discover it, sir!" responded Madge, confidently, at which the doctor smiled.

The position of nurse to Miss Frenton was anything but a sinecure; her illness took an acute form and both doctor and attendant had a hard fight to pull her round.

Mrs. Mason, a faithful old housekeeper, helped to the utmost, but the work of looking after the patient fell almost entirely on the nurse. The doctor was afraid that she would break down, and thought of wiring to his friend for another nurse to help, but Madge begged him not to do so. "I want to have the credit of this all to myself, and I am sure I can go through it!" she pleaded.

The doctor agreed, surprised at her devotion, but he did not know that Madge wished to obtain a hold on the patient's gratitude for the sake of the man who had, as she thought, left her for another.

Madge Walton shivered one day when she saw a letter on the hall-table ready to be posted; it was in Mrs. Mason's handwriting, and was addressed to Mark Holland. She sought the housekeeper and made inquiry with assumed innocence.

"I understand that Miss Frenton's nephew incurred her displeasure about something, and is not now recognised by her. But, as she is so ill, do you not think that he should be informed?"

"Bless you, nurse, don't let Miss Frenton hear that!" gasped the housekeeper in dismay. "I don't mind telling you, because I know you won't tell tales, that I wrote to Mr. Holland about it, and I had a letter from him this morning. I have just written to him again. I like him, and a man ought to be free to marry who he likes!"

"Does Mr. Holland propose to come here?" asked Madge, and her heart seemed to stop beating as she waited for the answer.

"I advised him not to," replied Mrs. Mason. "At any rate, not yet!"

"He must not come till I say so!" said Nurse Walton firmly, presuming on her authority to overawe Mrs. Mason. "And did you tell him my name? I suppose you said that a nurse was here?"

"Yes, but I didn't say anything about you."

"That is well. Please don't mention my name. You see," she added thoughtfully, "if he came and knew my name, Miss Frenton might think that I had been corresponding with him, and that would set her against me and she might be ill again."

"That's true, nurse!" said the simple Mrs. Mason, profoundly impressed.

Madge Walton felt that she was safe, so far. She must have time to complete her task, and then, when she was gone and he and his aunt reconciled, he might learn who had effected the reconciliation.

At last, after many weary days, the time came when Miss Frenton could lie on the couch near the window, in the rays of the unusually warm Spring sun, and listen to Nurse Walton reading.

"Stop reading for a while; I want to talk to you!" commanded Miss Frenton. The tone, although one of command, was more gentle than it had been for many years. "You have been very attentive to me, and I am not an ungrateful woman, whatever other people may say! You look ill; you must have a rest!"

Digitized by Google

"I shall soon be able to leave you, Miss Frenton," said Madge. "My work here is nearly finished. Then I shall rest awhile."

"Nonsense!" snapped the invalid, with some of her old acerbity. "I shall go away as soon as I can be moved; I shall go to Bournemouth, and you must come with me!"

Madge shook her head slowly.

Miss Frenton, at the risk of making herself ill, resumed her remarks in an energetic manner that was astonishing in one who had been so ill.

"I shall require a nurse for some time yet, and I can pay. You must come!"

Madge could hardly restrain a smile; the difference between her reception by Miss Frenton and this new turn of affairs was very great. She was only human, was Madge, and she could not resist the retort.

"You can have a companion, Miss Frenton, not merely a trained nurse!"

Miss Frenton shot a quick glance at Madge. Her face showed that some inward struggle was taking place. After a minute's silence Miss Frenton spoke.

"You have heard that I have said hard things about hospital nurses, and you are hitting me back. You are taking up the cudgels on behalf of the profession. That is fair. But you are not a hospital nurse, and——"

"I was till a few weeks before I came to you!" interposed Madge.

"Well, then you are an exception!" said Miss Frenton, shifting her position.

"That is not fair," interposed Madge again, gaining courage as she went on. "You are prejudiced, which is unjust. You know nothing of hospital nurses. Why are you so bitter against them?"

Again Miss Frenton was silent for several seconds.

"I do not wish to be unjust; that remark hurts me," she said slowly. "I will tell you. I educated my orphan nephew because he was the only child of my sister, and she was dear to me. I gave him all that was necessary to place him in a good position in life. Then a designing nurse captivated him, and gained such a hold on him, that he preferred to cast me aside—me, who had been a mother to him—and cling to her!"

"Did you object to his marrying at all?" asked Madge. "No? Then why object to her as a wife?"

"If she had been a lady," began Miss Frenton. She was feeling a trifle ashamed of her action, for the first time. "If she had been like you, now, I would have welcomed her!"

A spasm crossed the sweet face of Madge Walton, but she controlled her voice as she replied:

"I scarcely think that I am an exception; I believe that you would find her an agreeable companion." It was hard—so hard!—to plead for the one who had taken her place in the heart of Mark Holland, but she went bravely through her ordeal. "You have never seen her, so you cannot judge honestly. You imposed your will on your nephew without even giving him the opportunity of defending his choice. What sort of a man would he be who would meekly give up the woman he loved without a struggle?"

Miss Frenton winced at this outspoken remark. She looked with admiration at the beautiful face of her nurse, flushed with excitement, and sighed.

"Perhaps I was a little hard on him," she admitted. "Yes, I suppose I ought to have seen her. But that is all over now; she would never forgive me, even if he did! Let us talk of something else. You must come with me to Bournemouth; I am a lonely woman and I want a companion. You would make a sweet companion, nurse!"

Madge laughed awkwardly; the happiness of being a helpmeet and companion to the man of her choice was denied to her. She shook her head.

"You can have the companionship of a niece if you are morally strong enough to admit that you were wrong—as you ought to do!—and reinstate your nephew!" she asserted boldly. She felt that she must fight for him, her love! "He has constantly inquired after your condition and would have come had he not been forbidden!"

Before Miss Frenton could reply Mrs. Mason entered.

"Mr. Holland is here, miss, and says that we have no right to keep him away. I was to tell you that he wished to inquire after your health and did not come for mer—mercenary motives! I think that was it!"

"You must see him!" cried Madge, turning pale. "You owe it to him, and if you think that I have any claim upon you, repay me by thinking better of him! I will go!"

She flitted upstairs, where she waited with a white, haggard face. Mark Holland was shown into his aunt's presence, and had great difficulty in repressing his amazement at seeing her extend a feeble hand with a smile and an apology. Whatever had happened?

"I don't think I should ever have altered my opinion," said Miss Frenton, a little later, "if I had not been ill and been attended by a former hospital nurse. I haven't seen your future wife, Mark, but if Miss Hoyle is like my nurse, you have the sweetest——"

"Miss Hoyle?" queried Mark. "I'm not going to marry Miss Hoyle! Where did you get her name from? No; the woman I would have chosen is gone; before I could make her an offer, she left the hospital and I lost trace of her. I had to discontinue my little attentions, owing to the change in my circumstances, so I expect she thought I did not care for her, or perhaps she did not care for me! I should like to see this nurse of yours; what is her name?"

"Walton."

"What!" cried Mark, springing from his chair and almost causing his aunt a nervous shock. "That is she! I must see her!"

Dreading the ordeal, Madge Walton obeyed the summons reluctantly. She entered the room all of a tremble, although outwardly calm.

"Miss Walton——" began the patient.

"Madge!" interrupted Mark Holland impetuously. "Why did you leave me? Who told you that stupid rumour?" He held out his arms, eager to enfold her, yet uncertain whether she cared for him sufficiently to come to him. "I have tried to find you! My aunt has told me all. Madge, will you come to me?"

Something affected Miss Frenton's eyes at that moment; they began to water copiously, and while she was using her handkerchief, she could not see what was happening. She heard a glad cry, that was all. When her eyes were clear again, Mark and her nurse were standing before her, hand in hand.

"Do you think you would mind living with us, aunt, and permitting my wife to take care of you?" he asked.

Madge gave a happy little laugh as Miss Frenton caught her disengaged hand, drew her nearer to the couch, and kissed her.

"I don't suppose it will be so sweet as those you have just had," she said with a malicious twinkle in her eyes, that quite transformed the wan face and made Madge blush furiously, "but it is just as genuine in its way."

HELD APART.

The Story of a Strange Double Fraud and its Influence upon some Young Hearts, a Great Name, and a Famous Fortune.

By R. NORMAN SILVER, author of "The Golden Dwarf," "The Daughter of Mystery," etc.

THIRTIETH CHAPTER.

You Talk in Riddles.

THE explorer and the war-correspondent strode across the park in the direction of the curious grassy hollow that contained the ancient and weather-beaten pile of the mausoleum. Edward Stormont was mute, revolving his own thoughts, Paul Jerome was silent also, watching his friend and host. A finger and thumb thrust into one of his vest-pockets, held, half-unconsciously, the scrap of jewelled tortoiseshell.

"You spoke," said the explorer at length, abruptly, and without checking his swift and angry paces, "of having been, for some time, cognisant of a mystery. What did you mean?"

Jerome did not answer directly. "Let us see first if my suspicions are correct," he replied, "then you shall have the whole story."

Edward Stormont bit his lip. "Suspicions," he repeated, and added a trifle sharply, "it seems to me, Jerome, that if you had suspicions of such importance as would now appear to be the case, I ought to have been informed of them."

The war-correspondent made a gesture of dissent.

"No, no," he said gravely, "the more serious a suspicion is, Stormont, the more necessary it should be confided to no one until it has been substantiated. Besides, it is only within the last ten minutes that I have been given a clue to the solution of the problem with which I have been wrestling. I have not even had time to work out the details."

"And am I," asked the explorer, drily, "am I not to inquire what this same clue may be?"

"Your daughter's name," said Paul Jerome, "the two words, 'Moira Stormont.'"

Edward Stormont plucked irritably at his iron-grey beard. "You talk in riddles, Jerome," he exclaimed. "I will not wrong you by supposing that you have not an adequate reason for all this assumption of mystery."

Jerome quickened his stride. "Assumption, my dear Stormont," he retorted, "there is no need for an assumption of mystery. The whole thing, as yet, is one to me. I cannot even persuade myself to credit the amazing conclusion that forces itself upon me. That is why I am anxious not to put it into words until I have some tangible basis for it."

The war-correspondent was about to enter the winding alley that formed a short "cut" between the Tower and the principal gateway of the park, passing, in its course, through the plantations which surrounded the mausoleum. He stopped; at the distant curve of the long drive had appeared a smart phaeton and pair—he recognised them as the favourite turn-out of Guy Vanbrugh.

"One moment, Stormont," said Paul Jerome. "Strange as it may seem to you, certain threads of the mystery with which we are dealing are in Vanbrugh's hands. I will, with your permission, ask him to join us in our investigation."

The explorer would have spoken, but Jerome was already hastening down the avenue towards the advancing phaeton. Guy Vanbrugh drew up and leant over to grasp the war-correspondent's hand. Their eyes met in silent comprehension, but, manlike, the one shrank as much from uttering as the other from hearing spoken sympathy.

"How are you, Jerome?" Observed Guy Vanbrugh, curtly. "I suppose my cousin is still at the Tower, I—I wanted to see her." He hesitated. "It—it was good of you to come up with her yesterday," he faltered. "I—I——"

He fingered his reins and stared down at them intently. Jerome suppressed a sigh.

"Vanbrugh," he said in a low tone, and drawing closer to the step of the phaeton, "I'm afraid I can't do as I should like and leave a horribly recent wound untouched. But the fact is, I think I—I ought to ask you some questions about—about poor Miss—Miss Davenal."

Guy Vanbrugh's features twitched at the sound of the name and he lifted his head almost haughtily.

"You will know more than anyone else about Miss Davenal's history and antecedents," pursued Jerome hurriedly, for Edward Stormont, following him, had all but gained the point where the phaeton had halted, "but if I am not wrong in certain audacious conclusions, she was not John Davenal's daughter, nor was her name Davenal."

The reins in Guy Vanbrugh's brown fingers were bent and twisted convulsively.

"I—I don't understand how you have come by the information, Jerome," he stammered, "or—forgive me—how the matter can concern you. But what you have said is no news to me. Miss Davenal—that is, Moira, was the soul of honour, all that she knew of herself I knew also. But it did not matter—I—I——"

He covered his face with a hollowed palm; he could not go on. Their conversation was otherwise interrupted; Edward Stormont had come up to them. The war-correspondent had turned to him.

"Stormont," he said, "I am in the curious position of knowing, or, at all events, of suspecting, the truth about a problem in which both Vanbrugh and yourself are more deeply, I am sorry to say, more tragically interested than I. Yet, as I have already suggested to you, we had better postpone explanations until I can be sure that I am not the victim of circumstantial evidence and a morbid imagination. Perhaps Vanbrugh will leave the phaeton to his man and join us."

Impressed by Jerome's air of quiet intelligence, Guy Vanbrugh gave the reins to the groom at his back, added a brief instruction, and descended. The war-correspondent took his arm, and the three, piloted by Jerome, walked down the leafy alley hard by.

"This morning, Vanbrugh," remarked the war-correspondent, as they went, "two fishermen brought to Stormont a piece of wet and rotting wood with a fragment of engraved metal—apparently part of a coffin-plate—attached to it. It had been cast ashore by last night's gale, and bore the name of Stormont, and two dates seventeen or eighteen years ago."

Guy Vanbrugh started. Paul Jerome noted the fact, but pressed his companion's arm arrestingly.

"Those dates," he proceeded, "Stormont recognised as the date on which his only child—a girl—was born, and that on which she died. The plate he also recognised as resembling that affixed to her coffin. We are now on our way to examine that coffin, Stormont supposing that an act of terrible desecration may have taken place. You will not wonder at my enlisting your co-operation when you learn that the name of the child, the name presumably missing from the broken plate, was Moira."

Guy Vanbrugh stood still, dazed alike by Paul Jerome's words, and by his apparent intimacy with more than one carefully guarded secret. Edward Stormont intervened, he was pale and excited.

"This is hardly kind to me, Jerome," he said, "for Heaven's sake be explicit! Why do you speak to Guy of my dead child, what can he or you know of her, what can either of you have to do with the discovery of her broken coffin-plate in Groudle Bay?"

For answer the war-correspondent pointed across the open glade to which they had penetrated. Before them, its domed roof rising above the rim of the grassy hollow about it, was the mausoleum.

"There lies the explanation of the riddle," he responded. The explorer looked at him with concentrated brows, then glanced down at the great key which he still carried in his hand. It was old and intricate, but in good condition—the grease on its wards and barrel showed how it had been protected against the ravages of rust.

Paul Jerome pressed forward towards the steps that gave access to the hollow. Instinctively the others followed him—glancing covertly at each other. A moment more and Edward Stormont had turned the key in the lock of the heavy iron door. It swung back and the trio entered.

For the second time in his investigations the war-correspondent had had the forethought to pocket one of his bedroom candles. He produced and lit it. The gloomy, honeycombed interior of the vault became visible.

"Which is the compartment?" asked Paul Jerome gently of his elder companion.

Edward Stormont indicated one of the ranged recesses that was not far from the level of the ground. In its square aperture was perceptible the end of a leaden casket. On this latter was a plate, discoloured by age and the vapours of the place. It was inscribed—

MOIRA STORMONT
Aged 1 year and 7 months.
August 10, 1886.

The war-correspondent held the candle down and directed the explorer's attention to the inscription.

Edward Stormont shook his head.

"The plate was rather that from the shell within," he said; "we must lift the leaden casket out."

Guy Vanbrugh was studying the wording on the engraved metal with thoughtful, troubled eyes. Jerome touched him on the shoulder.

"You will help us, Vanbrugh?" he murmured. The younger man roused and assented. Together the three gripped the leaden receptacle, slid it from its recess, and set it on the granite floor. The war-correspondent noticed as they did so, that the massive lid was unsealed and loose.

Removing the candle from the ledge where he had temporarily deposited it, he brought it to the side of the casket, and extracting from a hip-pocket a many-bladed knife, he opened a short steel lever, and inserted it in the crack between lid and casket.

The leaden slab slipped up, and he lifted it off. An exclamation burst simultaneously from his own and the onlooker's lips. The casket was empty!

The explorer muttered a terrible anathema upon the authors of the sacrilege. But Paul Jerome checked him.

"Stormont," he said, "how if this does not mean what you imagine? How if it was not a dead but a living child of which this coffin was cheated?"

Edward Stormont cried out like a woman. "My child," he said, "my little Moira, alive, not dead. Great Heaven, that it could be so! But what—how——"

The war-correspondent shivered; there was an extravagance of joy in the explorer's face that was almost ecstasy.

"Alas, my poor friend!" he answered, "I cannot say that; would that I could. But if all be as I suspect—as I fear—here is one who can tell you of her as she grew to be, one who loved her, one who grieves for her even more than you can do now." And he drew forward Guy Vanbrugh.

In the flickering light of the candle Edward Stormont stood by the empty coffin and gazed incredulously at his nephew. Guy Vanbrugh put a shaking hand on the explorer's shoulder.

"I suppose it's true," he said unsteadily, "though I can scarcely figure it all out, or understand how Jerome got at it.

Twenty Minutes Late.

All the way from King's Cross we had been steadily losing time. The rails were wet and the train unusually heavy. At York we were twenty minutes late. There the railway people attached an additional engine and the train entered the Waverley Station, Edinburgh, that night on time. The principle is commonplace; when you cannot diminish an excessive load, increase the power. But what is an excessive load? Gently now. Wait a bit.

On any correct scale one hundred pounds is one hundred pounds, but on the back of a porter it is one thing and on the back of a slender girl quite another. To the first it is nothing to notice, to the second, it is crushing. In other words, weight is a question of what supports it.

This, then, is the principle on which we are to understand Mrs. Margaret Williams' assertion that she was heavy some years ago. No doubt the weighing machine would have showed her some pounds off her proper weight; for she was ill, out of sorts, and not eating anything to speak of. All the same, the lighter she got the heavier she felt; and when it comes to one's relation to one's own weight it is feeling, and not the scales, that settles the point.

For several years she dragged along in this unsatisfactory way; always weary and fatigued, as if from hard and continuous labour, when, in fact, she was doing scarcely any work at all. Indeed, her weakness was so great she could hardly get about.

If Mrs. Williams could have eaten heartily and digested her food well, it might be thought she would have recovered. But it was precisely because she could not do so that the illness came upon her. In other words she was suffering from chronic indigestion and its consequences. Let her tell her own story. Writing from her home, 8, Brook Street, Taibach, near Port Talbot, on January 24th, 1903, she says: "I could not digest the food I took, and in consequence it lay like lead on my chest, causing me excruciating pain round the heart and between the shoulders, often followed by vomiting.

"I varied my diet, ceased to take solids and lived on bread and milk, but all to no purpose. Loss of sleep, splitting headaches, and flatulency added to my sufferings."

The usual means of relief having been tried in vain, Mrs. Williams resorted to Mother Siegel's Syrup, with what result she shall state herself: "After the first two bottles," she declares, "I felt somewhat better, but a marked change took place after I had taken the third bottle. I could then eat without vomiting or experiencing any pain, felt my food was nourishing me, regained strength, and in a short time was quite cured and have never suffered from indigestion since."

Truly, no matter what the scales may affirm as to one's weight, one never feels encumbered by it so long as plenty of well-digested food furnishes the power and strength which should fill it from head to heel. When digestion fails, the remedy—as shown in numberless instances—is the same that restored again to Mrs. Williams the vigour of health.

Eloquence and Dyspepsia.

A keen observer of human life declares that all good after-dinner speakers are dyspeptics. The vital force which is required by the digestive apparatus in the performance of its functions is, he asserts, used up by the brain, at the expense of the stomach, liver and kidneys, which are thus robbed of their power to digest and assimilate food. When digestion fails, whether from overwork, loss of tone, or errors of diet, the surest remedy—as has been proved in thousands of cases—is Mother Seigel's Syrup. It completely cured Mr. Wm. Taylor, 15, Hanover Street, Haverstock Hill, London, of acute indigestion and debility. He still takes it occasionally, for he says: "I find it aids my digestion and regulates the system."

SERIAL STORY.

But Moira told me recently that she wasn't Moira Davenal—John Davenal had just confessed it, on what narrowly escaped being his death-bed. A while before he had brought up, when working on my yacht in the bay, part of an inscribed plate with the name 'Moira' on it, and the words 'Born' and 'Died.' It was the other half, no doubt, of the one brought to you. The coffin from which the plate came must have been thrown into the bay."

"Yes, yes," exclaimed the explorer, for the speaker had paused wearily.

"What is the use of trying to fathom it all now?" continued Guy Vanbrugh, the depression of a profound melancholy betraying itself in his tones. "It won't give her back to me. Davenal was too ill to tell her any more, and after that the nurses wouldn't let them talk. We were going to ask him about it when he got well; we were going to do a great many things then."

Edward Stormont gripped the hand that lay on his shoulder.

"Then," he cried; "why do you say 'then' and 'now' like that? If my child was not dead and not buried, and if she grew up, why, as Jerome says, do you not take me to her? Who is Davenal, and why should she be passed off as his child? She is mine, and I will see her righted. I can guess why she was made to die this sham death, she stood between wealth and a selfish woman, whom I was fool enough to trust. Fool, triple fool, that I was."

The explorer was speaking excitedly and at random, like a man in a trance.

Paul Jerome stepped a pace or two nearer.

"John Davenal," he said, "and Hannah Davenal, your sister-in-law's maid, were brother and sister. He is a widower, and has passed as having one daughter, a girl of eighteen or nineteen, named Moira. Vanbrugh saw her and loved her, they were even, with a certain romantic secrecy, betrothed. A series of significant incidents, not easy to set out coherently, suggest that she may have been your daughter. Unhappily she was drowned yesterday in Groudle Bay."

Edward Stormont groaned, and his hands closed with a nervous tenderness over those of Guy Vanbrugh.

"My boy," he said, "my poor boy!"

Paul Jerome heard a sob from the throat of the younger man and slipped away, leaving the two alone together.

Gliding out of the small, heavy portal into the fresh, bright morning, he moved to clear the line of sight from the entrance. The grief of the two at once so strangely bereaved and so strangely brought together did not permit even of the neighbourhood of a third.

As he lingered, scanning idly the not unpicturesque vistas presented by the glade and the plantations, he heard his own name called in a familiar voice, and facing about, beheld, mounted upon the verge of the hollow in which he himself was lounging, the tall form of Mr. Ussher. With him was another person, a woman.

Paul Jerome gasped and stared, and stared and gasped again. There was no mistaking the shy yet proud features, the blue eyes, the red-gold tresses, the delicately-poised, almost classic head. They were those of the girl he had seen in the diving dress in Groudle Bay, the girl who was Guy Vanbrugh's betrothed, the girl whom they had believed drowned.

THIRTY-FIRST CHAPTER.

"Oh, Sir, my Lady!"

"This is Mr. Jerome, Miss Davenal, the gentleman of whom I have been speaking. No doubt he will be able to tell us if Sir Guy has called at the Tower this morning."

With these calmly uttered words the detective introduced his companion to the war-correspondent. Paul Jerome had leapt across the hollow and sprung upon its edge at the point where Mr. Ussher and Moira were standing. The latter bowed shyly, and Jerome saw that she was not only pretty, but well-bred, and did not wonder at the whole-hearted enthusiasm which had prompted Guy Vanbrugh to offer the diver's supposed daughter his name and hand in marriage. He bowed in return.

"I am delighted," he began, "to see you safe and sound, Miss——" He paused over the next word, but gave her her usual surname—"Miss Davenal," he said. "We feared that you were no longer to be numbered with the living. The——the accident——"

Again he paused, and looked at Mr. Ussher. The detective blushed.

"You are right, sir," he remarked, nervously. "Miss Davenal's account of the affair—as completed under a little cross-examination, for the young lady is most discreet and far from vindictive—bears out your view. Hartigan decoyed her into the boat upon some pretext, upset it, as she thought by accident. But once in the water and finding that she could swim, he tried deliberately to thrust her under, saying that he 'would do for her this time.'"

"Great Heaven!" ejaculated the war-correspondent, glancing at the shy, slight heroine of this terrifying experience.

"Miss Davenal," went on the detective, "escaped by diving, and was carried out by the current as far as Groudle Island. The lighthouse men there knew her and gave her shelter for the night—the gale prevented her return till this morning."

"Groudle Island!" cried Jerome; "why, that is three miles out."

Moira smiled involuntarily at his surprise. "I am one of the best swimmers in all Groudle," she said; "father taught me."

The word she had used so instinctively in speaking of the diver recalled the war-correspondent to a sense of the situation.

"Miss—Miss Davenal," he observed; "you will pardon my seeming presumption when I say that I am aware of your engagement to Sir Guy Vanbrugh."

He glanced over his shoulder at the mausoleum. The explorer and the baronet still lingered in the shadowy place.

"You are well informed, sir," commented the detective, ruefully; "however, I myself gathered yesterday that, as it was reported in the village, Sir Guy Vanbrugh had been paying Miss Davenal—begging her pardon—considerable attention. This morning I went up to make some tentative investigations—for I will confess, sir, that your view of Hartigan's proceedings rather haunted me. Judge of my amazement, sir, when at the Close I met Miss Davenal herself, anxious, as I ventured to conclude, to reassure Sir Guy, should he have heard of her supposed death. The servants said he had driven over here and we came across together."

Paul Jerome stepped down into the hollow at their feet. "A moment," he said, and, without further parley, strode to the mausoleum door. For the first time Mr. Ussher perceived that it was open and a new thrill of bewildered curiosity seized him.

The war-correspondent was looking into the gloomy interior of the granite pile. Edward Stormont stood with bent head and folded arms, Guy Vanbrugh, plucking restlessly at his driving gloves, was talking to him in low, broken sentences. Mastering imperfectly his own emotion, he was speaking of Moira, of her beauty, of her housewifely ways, of her frank yet proud simplicity.

Jerome went out of the sunshine into the shadow that surrounded the two men, and confronted them suddenly.

"Guy," he said, "Stormont—you are not women to start or faint at a piece of strange, good news. It is not the first time by many, and it will not be the last by many more, that the sea has given up its fancied prey—alive."

Guy Vanbrugh tottered like a drunken man and clutched at the war-correspondent's arm.

"Jerome," he gasped, "old fellow, you don't mean—Moira?"

"Yes, I do," he was answered heartily. "She reached Groudle Island in safety, carried thither by the current. The gale detained her at the lighthouse station there, and she only landed at Groudle this morning. She is outside now."

The baronet broke from him, and darted into the open. Paul Jerome turned to Edward Stormont.

"Fate has given happiness back to Vanbrugh," he said; "let us hope that it has also given you back a daughter. But as yet she knows nothing of you. Be patient for a little. Vanbrugh must have suffered terribly in the last few hours."

The explorer drew a long breath and was silent, studying the empty leaden casket beside him.

The war-correspondent touched his arm.

"She is a lovely creature," he added. "Time promises to pay you a lavish interest on his debt. Will you not steal a glimpse of her unawares? It may be that some fortunate resemblance will confirm our apparently fantastic suppositions. She does not favour you except in the colour of her eyes. Her hair is a wonderful red-gold."

Edward Stormont started from his peculiar stupor. Jerome's last sentence had pierced it. He sprang to the door of the mausoleum. Near it stood Guy Vanbrugh and his betrothed—the fair head and the brown one very close together. Further off, contemplating the tree-tops with a great show of interest, was Mr. Ussher.

The explorer's gaze fastened hungrily upon the unconscious girl and his hands went out slowly, quiveringly. It was as if some irresistible attraction were drawing him to her.

"How like!" he muttered—and there was a yearning sob in his deep voice; "how very like—her!"

The sob rose to a piercing cry. Moira had turned—Guy Vanbrugh was pointing to the figure of the explorer. She made a step in the direction of Edward Stormont. But the explorer was already at her side. Tremblingly he took her face in his hands, poring upon it with a pathetic intensity.

But the cry he had uttered at the sight of her features had been eloquent of the conviction they had brought him. There was stamped upon them, plain for him to read, in a trick of lips and brows and eyes as they smiled up at him in a wistful sympthy, the likeness—the soul's likeness—of the only woman he had ever loved.

He forgot, in a flash, the as yet incomplete chain of proof, the amazing nature of the involved problems, the extravagance of the view that he was accepting, and, with an inarticulate exclamation of love and pity, folded her in his arms.

Moira had not wept on her lover's breast, but, some strange new emotion overcoming her, she laid her head on Edward Stormont's shoulder, and burst into tears.

Jerome shot a glance of satisfaction and significance at Guy Vanbrugh, and, passing the three, joined Mr. Ussher. The detective had faced about and was regarding this latest development of the situation with ludicrous perplexity.

"Well," asked the war-correspondent, "and what about Hartigan now?"

A ruddy glow overspread the other's countenance. "You have wiped my eyes a second time, sir," he said, "and what is worse, our bird is flown. I called at the Half Brick on my way here with Miss Davenal, meaning to clap the darbies on the fellow, but he had left—for foreign parts, he told the landlord."

"That won't do," answered Jerome, thoughtfully, "we must have him—for many reasons we must have him."

"Quite so, sir," agreed the detective; "I did send down an ostler to the depot with a description of him to be circulated. This will be done immediately. But my instinct led me to follow up Sir Guy's association with Miss Davenal, and besides, I wished to see you."

Mr. Ussher bent to the war-correspondent's ear.

"Excuse me, sir," he pursued, "but I fancy I don't yet know all that you do. What did Hartigan want to kill Miss Davenal for—she herself apparently can't tell. And what is she to Mr. Stormont?—something more than ordinary, by what we have just seen. And why do I find all you gentlemen in this particular neighbourhood, with that queer burial place open. What is going on?"

Jerome hesitated. "I am not sure," he replied, "that I ought to answer any of those questions before consulting Stormont himself. I had better do so at once."

Curious Effect of a Crust of Bread.

A curious effect of a crust of bread is communicated by Mrs. Frances Butterfield, of Albert Cottages, Victoria Road, Mexboro, a woman who has been restored to health by Bile Beans after suffering forty years from indigestion and biliousness. She says: "When I saw a piece of breadcrust it had a most peculiar effect. It would suggest the sticking of food at the chest. A feeling of dryness, and by degrees a sharp cutting pain would come on. I had had indigestion from being a girl, and frequent bilious attacks. I should vomit green bile one day, and be so bad that for two or three days afterwards I could do no work. An acute pain at the chest and through the shoulders was an unfailing sign that another attack of indigestion was due, and then I should be prostrated for a few days. It was terrible! Often I was so weak and dizzy that I reeled if I stooped to pick up anything or made the slightest strain in doing what I was engaged upon. My husband used to look at me sometimes and say "You look like death." Sometimes I should be burning hot one minute and chill as ice the next, and these alternate hot and cold sensations would occasionally keep me awake all night. The doctor I consulted didn't seem to be able to give me any relief. I can safely say I have swallowed hundreds of bottles of medicine and boxes of different pills, but still I went on ailing just the same, until just over fifteen months ago. At that time I was very bad, and on the advice of a friend I tried a box of Bile Beans. It did me good, and I got another. Just by what stages they acted upon me I can't now say, but within a few weeks after beginning with Bile Beans I found they were curing me. I persevered with them, and within three months they had cured me completely. For forty long years I had never been free from indigestion and biliousness for longer than a few days. It is now twelve months since Bile Beans cured me, and during the whole of that time I have never had a trace of either complaint. This leaves no mistake about the permanency of my cure. I have recommended Bile Beans to scores of people, and I shall continue to recommend them."

The above facts have been embodied in a sworn statement made by Mrs. Butterfield before a Commissioner for Oaths. Mrs. Butterfield is the mother of seven children, and one of her grown-up sons was amongst the miners affected by the recent strike at the Denaby and Cadeby Collieries, in connection with which so many families were evicted.

He made his way back to the explorer, taking from his pocket, as he went, the fragment of jewelled tortoiseshell.

"Pardon me, Stormont," he said, when he had gained the little group hard by, "but one matter presses. The worthy Mr. Ussher represents the law, and, as this young lady will tell you, the death from which she has escaped so narrowly was not an accident but an attempted murder."

Edward Stormont recoiled. "Murder!" he repeated, and Guy Vanbrugh echoed his exclamation.

"Yes," said Jerome; "Hartigan, the husband of Lady Tarleton's late maid, Hannah Davenal, and the man originally suspected, as you know, of compassing that singular person's death, tried to drown her—in fact, believed he had done so."

"Davenal's husband!" muttered the explorer, "so! Villainy never lacks choice of instruments. I remember now, both man and woman had true gallows-faces."

Jerome held out his hand with the broken pin in it. He saw that Edward Stormont's thoughts were running in the same channel as his own.

"You recollect the day when you were so angry at finding the mausoleum open," he remarked, "and my brushing the threshold for the door to close. I picked this up there, and kept it, by an odd chance."

The explorer took the piece of jewelled tortoiseshell. "What is this?" he demanded.

"You will recollect also," continued the war-correspondent, momentarily ignoring the question, "a gamekeeper of yours confessing to Ussher that he believed he had seen, late on a particular evening—or rather in the small hours of the following morning—a certain person passing near this spot and accompanied by Hannah Davenal?"

"Yes," answered Edward Stormont, with some attention.

"This pin," proceeded Jerome, gravely, "has been recognised as being one of a valuable set given by her daughter to——"

Edward Stormont interrupted him hastily. "But the matter with which we are now dealing," he said, "took place sixteen or seventeen years ago. Why should she have revisited the—the scene so recently."

Paul Jerome shook his head. "That is part of the mystery," he responded; "the mystery to which the death of Hannah Davenal belongs."

The explorer frowned, then put Moira's arm in his own, and moved off. "Bring Ussher with you," he said; "the fellow may be needed. Once for all we will fathom the whole scoundrelly business."

Guy Vanbrugh went forward with his kinsman and his betrothed. The war-correspondent only stayed to summon the detective. There was a trifle of reluctance, even of anxiety, in his bearing. But he, too, strode with his companion across the glade and made for the Tower. By the time he had evaded half a dozen of the detective's questions, they had caught up with Moira and her escort, and all five entered the Tower together.

Edward Stormont led the way to his library and laid his hand upon the knob of the door. It resisted. He had forgotten that Irene had been left to the protection of its stout lock and thick panels. Jerome tapped and called cheerily to the occupant of the room. The lock clicked within, the latch whined, and the opening door revealed the captive.

When she saw Moira she started forward with a glad cry. Too practical for superstitious alarm, she had guessed the truth instantaneously.

"Oh, my dear!" she exclaimed, "so you didn't get drowned after all. You can't tell how glad I am. But what has been happening that you come here with—with Sir Guy and Uncle Edward?"

She stopped, catching a significant glance from her lover. Edward Stormont had passed her almost roughly into the library, put Moira into a chair, and rang the bell. Guy Vanbrugh followed, not without a covert squeeze of Irene's hand, and took up his position by Moira, while Mr. Ussher, slipping modestly into the apartment, retreated to a convenient corner.

Irene watched these proceedings with acute interest; Paul Jerome had lingered in the middle of the room, the troubled, doubtful expression still hanging about his usually resolute features. A look of anxious pity crossed them suddenly, and he drew nearer to Irene. A servant, answering the imperious peal of the bell, had entered the library.

"Ask her ladyship," said Edward Stormont harshly, "if she will be good enough to come down to the library. And Jerome," he added, "perhaps Irene will take your word and mine that she will save herself and us pain by withdrawing."

Irene coloured—her uncle's tone was almost insulting.

Jerome whispered to her.

"Forgive him, dear," murmured the war-correspondent; "he has had a great shock—he is not himself. Let us slip out together. I am afraid there is going to be a trying scene."

"How strange," said Irene, in the same guarded tone; "about us? Then why is Miss Davenal here, and Guy?"

The war-correspondent did not reply, but drew her gently from the room. They did not cross the threshold—the footman, returning, with extraordinary speed, from his mission, burst into the apartment. But it was not to precede and announce Lady Tarleton, the man's face was white and his eyes starting.

"Oh, sir," he gasped, "my lady!"

The explorer glanced, but once, at the man's tell-tale visage, then rose and dashed from the room.

A Popular Medical Journal on Deafness.

The April "Review of Ear, Nose, and Throat Diseases" takes up the question of the lately reported increase in the percentage of deaf people. In the opinion of the Editor, the public knowledge of defective hearing and its causes must be developed, and to this end the present issue of the "Review" gives plainly worded instructions for testing the hearing, and a series of popular articles on "Prevention and Cure of Deafness." As this number of the "Review" is intended for public benefit, those who are interested in the subject can obtain a free copy by addressing the Editor, Drouet Institute, 10 Marble Arch, London, W. Another special feature of the "Review" is the enclosure of a Patient's Report Form, for the benefit of those who wish advice, for which no fee is charged, if given by correspondence. The Editor advises patients, however, when possible, to visit the Drouet Institute for a personal consultation with the medical staff. Consulting hours are—in the morning, 10 to 12, and in the afternoon, 2 to 4, week days only. A fee of five shillings is charged for personal consultation.

A WONDERFUL BEAUTIFIER.

A short time since our readers were informed about that wonderful preparation for the complexion, Peralia, and strongly advised to try it for blackheads, acne, wrinkles, crow's feet, pimples, &c. Now listen to what a recent user has got to say about it: "In reply to your kind letter, I have taken your advice and have procured a bottle of Henderson's Peralia from Boot's Drug Stores. Well! I must say I was astonished at the result. I have spent large amounts on so-called remedies, but with indifferent success; but one bottle of Peralia entirely removed the scurvy from which I was suffering from my face, and the unnatural redness from my nose. I am now using it on my hands and arms, which it has made lovely and white, and also find it excellent for chapped hands. I am in a large milliner's shop, and all the girls in our establishment use Peralia, and think it is lovely.—Yours faithfully, Ada Fleming, Station Street, Nottingham." That ought to be a sufficient testimonial for any reader, and we hope any of them that are suffering from such disfiguring humours will act on our advice, and at once give Peralia a trial. The Peralia Company is a very enterprising firm, and they are now making a present of a dainty little book, called "Beauty's Boudoir," to every purchaser of Peralia who asks for it. We are of the opinion that none of our lady readers should be without it. By the way, the prices of Peralia, post free, in plain wrapper, are 1s. 3d., 1s. 9d., and 2s. 9d.

Many of our readers, we are sure, would like to know of a really reliable hair curler. When we say reliable, we mean one that is not affected by rain, or the heat of a ballroom. To those who are interested, and are anxious to possess neat, curly locks, we recommend "Crimpoline." It is nothing short of marvellous the manner in which this fluid sets about its business. All you have got to do is simply to apply a little to your hair for a few nights and you soon become the owner of lovely wavy ringlets. No! you need no tongs, pins nor curlers. Sounds almost to good to be true, doesn't it? Well, try it and see for yourself. Several who have used it tell us that once you get the hair properly in curl with it, you need only use it once in the week. Its price is so very moderate, too, that none of our readers need be hindered from sending for it on that account. If you write to the proprietors, enclosing 2s. or 2s. 9d., either in stamps, or a postal order, they will send you a bottle, post free, and secretly packed. Their address is the Peralia Perfumery Co., Dept. 14, Camden Street, North Shields.

To CURE Drunkards

MRS. GEO. FULLER, who saved her husband.

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the She'd Like it Then.

He: "Would you like to hear me sing 'In the Sweet By-and-Bye,' Miss Mattie?" She (sweetly): "Yes, Henry, but not before."

A Splendid Compliment.

She: "Yes, my little girl is a beautiful child. People say she took her beauty from me." He (gallantly): "I can't say that I noticed your loss."

His Love Wasn't Blind.

He: "Stop! We can't sit down here; this is wet paint." She (tearfully): "I fear you don't love me blindly. If you did you would never have seen the paint."

Hurt His Feelings.

She: "I think Mr. Rymer, the minor poet, felt hurt at a remark you made the other night." He: "What did I say?" She: "You said there was only one Shakespeare."

It Would Save Curling Tongs.

"Cartoon has written a story that'll make your hair curl," said Mawson. "Get it for me, for goodness' sake!" said Mrs. M. "It'll save me from burning my fingers off with the tongs."

His Looks Would Tell.

Mr. Gotlots: "Do you really love my daughter, or do you only think you love her?" Percy Mushly (rapturously): "Oh, Mr. Gotlots! Can't you tell by my looks that there is no thinking about it?"

Showing Her Hatred.

"I thought, Miss S., that you hated that flirty minx; yet you went up and kissed her." "So I do hate her, and that is why I did it. Look at the big freckles on her chin where I kissed the powder off."

The Value of an Honoured Name.

"Young man," said the young woman's father, "you have boasted several times that you possess an honoured name." "Yes, sir," replied the foreign suitor, haughtily. "Well, may I inquire what bank it will be honoured at, and for how much?"

A Relic of War.

Jones (looking over friend's collection of curios): "Ah, and where did you say this cannon ball was from? A relic of some celebrated field of battle, I suppose?" Married Friend: "Yes, it is a relic of a field of battle—one between my wife and me last Christmas. It is her first Christmas pudding."

Such a Good Man!

"George," she said in a low voice, "would you make a great sacrifice for my happiness?" "Certainly," he replied. "Would you give up smoking for my sake?" "Give up smoking for your sake?" he repeated. Then after a silence he exclaimed hoarsely, "I can refuse you nothing. I will give up smoking for your sake. Hereafter when I smoke it will be for my own sake."

An Animal Proposal.

She: "You looked so sheepish when you proposed to me." He: "And you looked so wolfish when you accepted me."

Closed Eyes Needed.

"She sings with a great deal of expression, doesn't she?" "Yes, she does; but it's the kind that you must close your eyes to appreciate."

Only a Hint Dropping.

Maud (who lives next door): "What was that terrible noise I heard about twelve o'clock last night?" Mabel: "Papa dropped a hint for Charlie to go."

No Need to Prosecute.

Judge: "You say you do not wish to prosecute this defendant for stealing a kiss?" Fair Complainant: "No, your honour. The property has been restored."

The Employer's Reply.

"When I asked for a rise I told my employer I had grown grey in his service." "What did he say?" "He said if I had worked anywhere else I probably would have got bald."

Changed the Name.

"And so my little wife cooked all this herself. What does she call it?" "Well, I intended it for bread; but after it came out of the oven I concluded I'd better put sauce on it and call it pudding."

A Valuable Thumb.

Mrs. Wickwire: "The idea! Here is a story in the paper about a woman suing for £2,000 for the loss of only a thumb." Mr. Wickwire: "Perhaps it was the thumb she kept her husband under."

No Longer Engaged.

Afternoon Caller: "Is Miss Lippitt disengaged?" Nanette: "I'm afraid so, ma'am. I just see her young man hurry down th' front steps with the diamond ring she's been wearing since April."

Was It Intended?

Ella: "Pa says we can't marry for ten years. But don't look so sad, George; you are yet young." George: "Yes, I know I am, dearest. I wasn't thinking of myself, but of you, love." It was at once put off indefinitely.

Dressed to Kill!

Clara: "Now, I'm all ready for the ball. How do I look, Jack?" Jack: "You remind me of a Dervish in his war dress." Clara: "Oh, you nasty thing! I—I——" Jack: "Don't cry, darling! I simply meant you were dressed to kill."

She Hadn't Done So Yet.

"You've kissed that young Jones good-night and let him go, haven't you, Stella?" said a weary voice at the top of the stairs. There was an awful silence for a moment, and then in a timid, hesitating voice the young man in the darkened hall below responded: "No, ma'am, but I—I think she's going to."

Taking Strong Measures.

The modern woman is developing physically as well as intellectually. A powerful-looking damsel was heard the other day to complain of an insult offered to her by a yokel while she was taking a country ramble. "What did he do to you?" asked a sympathetic friend. "Chucked me under the chin." "And what did you do?" "Chucked him over the fence."

He Lost the Bet.

"Then it can never be?" he gasped, as he rose like a man in a dream. "No," she murmured, in a low but decided voice; "I am sorry, Mr. Poppledick, but it can never be. It is impossible." "Grant me, then," he said hoarsely, passing his hand across his blinded eyes, "one last request." She extended her hand in silence. "Let me," he said, in a low voice, "have half-a-crown until to-morrow night. I've got a bet on this, and I've lost, and the fellows are waiting patiently round the corner for me to treat them."

A Troubled Iceberg.

"CORAL."—Your letter is most interesting. You fear you could never love, as your temperament is too cold. Yet you have had very many suitors, who have been devoted to you, and whom you have wished to love. I know girls of your type, and think they often make very good friends for men.

* * * * *

Wait till you meet the man whom you like better than any others, and should he propose marriage, act on your own judgment as to accepting him. The "good fellowship" match is often a happy one—especially as you appear to have "Bohemian" ideas. But don't forget that actors' professions of love are often meaningless. They are too used to making them on the stage.

Love versus Family.

"GLOW WORM" is twenty-six. When he was eighteen he had to suddenly earn his own living, and took a place in a large shop. He has now met a girl who is a tradesman's daughter, but quite uneducated. "GLOW WORM" tells me he comes of a noble family, and that they would disown him if he married the girl. As they love each other, do I advise "GLOW WORM" to marry?

* * * * *

Well, "GLOW WORM," if your noble family have not been able to do anything better for you than they seem to have done, it would not seem to matter very much how they regarded your marriage. Marry the girl you love, and ignore your relations. As you are in for a business career, you had far better marry a girl in the same sphere than be dragged at the heels of somebody you do not love who is higher up socially.

Lover or Parent?

"E. A. C." is a lover, and also a good Samaritan to his sweetheart's parent, who is in a business which has fallen on evil days. "E. A. C." has been spending all his ready money in helping them, but the girl has written asking him to discontinue his attentions until things are financially brighter. Should he do this, or would it be better for him to insist on continuing his help?

* * * * *

If you feel that your help is really vital to them don't listen to their requests for you to cease it. That may be mere pride, and ought not to stand in the way of a really good action. If, however, things are really getting smoother with them, and the girl wishes to help her parent in the business, it would be perhaps better for you not to press your claims on her at present. The girl has to choose between helping her family and marrying, and has quite rightly given the first claim prior place. You, on your part, should be disposed to agree to this, at any rate until things improve.

Won't Raise his Hat.

"MARY" is in sad trouble. She recently met "ARTHUR," to whom she took a great fancy. This she told her friends. Now, "ARTHUR," though a very nice boy, has the very slightest knowledge of good manners. Whenever "MARY" meets him she bows very nicely, but "ARTHUR" never raises his hat. This has gone on for such a long time that "MARY" asks my advice as to how to convey to "ARTHUR" his proper duty when meeting a lady.

* * * * *

Let "MARY" go out with her brother, or cousin, or male friend, and when next they meet "ARTHUR," and she recognises him, let her request her escort to raise his hat in a very conspicuous way. If "ARTHUR" does not see from example what is the proper thing to do, then he must be lacking in intelligence as well as knowledge of good breeding, and would scarcely be a nice man for "MARY" to wish to cultivate.

One-sided Love.

"PERPLEXED" has been keeping company with a young lady for eighteen months, and is very much in love with her. When he proposed, she told him she did not like him better than any other man she knew, and did not think she could love anybody, as she did not experience the tender emotions. "PERPLEXED" proposed again, and got the same answer. The girl said she did not see why two people like themselves should not be happy.

* * * * *

I quite agree with the girl. There are very many people in the world like her, but not so outspoken. The average girl would have pretended to feel all sorts of things for you that she did not, and when she undeceived you would have done so in a way that might have broken your heart.

* * * * *

I do not see why, if she feels that she likes your society and respects your good qualities, and does not love anybody better than yourself, you should not drop all talk about love, and decide to go through life together, trusting that affection will follow, as it probably will. I have known many marriages in which the love has been one-sided, and yet the couples have been among the happiest.

A Flirt's Fancy.

"FLIRT" is twenty, and has been what her pen name suggests, but she has now decided that a gentleman twenty years older than herelf and rather above her socially is her ideal, and the only man she could ever love. She has only known him two months, when she terminated her friendship with him, as she knew her parents would never consent to it. Now she is two hundred miles away from him, and longs to see him again.

* * * * *

Such attachments are very dangerous. Very often girls of your age meet what they think to be their ideal men in those much older than themselves. Generally they are wrong. Men of that age are often only too prone to trifle with the affections of young girls. They are usually very skilled in the arts of flattery and courtship, and their conversation is generally far more interesting than that of their juniors. This accounts for their fascination for certain girls. But these men are very rarely sincere. Probably what they say to one girl is precisely the same as to others. I have seen too many cases of that sort of thing in men of mature age.

* * * * *

I should really try to forget him—unless, of course, he proves, by constant attentions to you, that he has serious intentions. But marriage is very much a lottery when the husband has twenty years' start of the girl. You must remember the time, ten or fifteen years hence, when you will still be a young woman, but your husband will be long past his prime.

THE BOND BETWEEN.

A Romance of Real Life.

By BLANCHE EARDLEY.

PROLOGUE.

"Those whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder." The sacred words were droned in monotonous tones by a lean, apathetic curate. The church is empty save for the two principals—Margaret Heath and Vernon Grant—and the necessary witnesses. After the ceremony, the bride and bridegroom leave for Paris.

Digby Scarlett turns over his letters leisurely in the interim between breakfast and sorting a cigar.

"Ah, here's one from my friend and collaborator, the valiant Vernon. I wonder what the Paris postmark means? Any way, it can wait until I have written to ask the adorable Margaret Heath to be my wife."

This done, he opens Vernon's letter, and when he reads the news of the latter's marriage to the girl to whom he has just penned a proposal, he murmurs—

"Twice hit by the same hand, and both blows destined to die with me—to bleed internally. Not bad for a man intellectually my inferior! But the third blow I shall get in. My innings begins to-day." Then he leaves for Paris to join the happy couple at their invitation.

Scarlett and Grant at one time had practised copying each other's signatures, and Grant had been very successful in his imitations of that of his friend. Now Scarlett persuades him, for a bet, to sign his name to a cheque for a large amount, promising to make it all right at the bank when presented. This, however, he fails to do, and Grant is arrested and sentenced to fifteen years' penal servitude for forgery, Scarlett not even saying a word in his defence. Mrs. Grant goes to the prison to bid her husband farewell, and tells him that she will never have anything more to do with him.

The First Chapters.

It is the birthday of Lady Maitland, the young second wife of Sir Trevor Maitland, of Maitland Manor. As a birthday gift her husband says that he has decided to give her a daughter—at present she has an only son, Woolf—by adopting a girl, Ivy Strange, who had been discovered in the grounds some fourteen years before, and brought up with Muriel, the baronet's younger daughter. Jack Maitland, Sir Trevor's elder son, is in love with Ivy.

Lady Maitland does not take very kindly to the proposal; then Sir Trevor says that he is expecting a visitor to dinner, in the person of Heriot North, an old friend of the family, who is coming to pay his addresses to Agnes, Sir Trevor's elder daughter.

All rights reserved.]

Outside the library door Lady Maitland stops and grips the banister with one white hand.

"It shall not be!" she mutters. "I will see no beggar brat sharing my son's fortune. I wish I had insisted on the girl going to the workhouse when she was first found! Woolf has been cheated of becoming the heir because of his step-brother, but he shall not also be cheated of his money! I must get the girl out of the way, but how?"

When North is introduced to Agnes it is evident that he is terribly disappointed in her. During dinner he mentions a forgery case which was tried eighteen years before, and describes the wife of the prisoner.

Lady Maitland utters a stifled cry.

"The—heat," she falters; then suddenly Heriot North springs to his feet in time to catch her in his arms.

Sir Trevor Maitland's wife has fainted.

When Lady Maitland goes up to her room to dress for dinner the following day she finds a man in her room—evidently a burglar. He is gazing at two photographs in a locket as she enters.

"Who are you?" she says sharply. "What are you doing here? I am Lady Maitland, and my husband is the Chief Constable of Melton. If you don't explain your presence I shall immediately ring for help."

"Now you 'ave introduced yourself, my lady, let me do the same. I am Mike Holland, ex-convict, and follow-worker on the bog-land of Dartmoor with the gentleman in this 'ere locket along with yourself. 'E left before me, on license, and we all knew that his lovely missis would 'ave nothing to do with 'im when 'e got 'is lagging, but I didn't know as I was to meet the lady under another name!

"I shall want to be paid for holding my tongue. Bigamy is an ugly charge to have made against one. I am an old gaol bird—quod is nothing to me—but your ladyship would find it difficult to swallow. Now will you give me in charge?"

Lady Maitland is just about to pull the bell when she hears Woolf's voice outside. She must preserve her son's good name at any price! She turns savagely on Holland, her motherhood up in arms for the boy outside.

"Hide in there!" she breathes hoarsely, pointing to the deep oak wardrobe. "I accept—silence!" The man obeys her, Woolf enters the room, and he and his mother start downstairs together. Lady Maitland goes back for a moment to turn the key in the wardrobe door.

Three hours later she is again in her room. Tremblingly she flings open the wardrobe door to find it—empty.

THE BOND BETWEEN.

FIFTH CHAPTER.

Lady Maitland Scores.

"FATHER, I want you to give me your consent to marry Ivy! Of course, not now, but, say, in a year or two. We are both young, and Time will soon fly."

Had a bomb been exploded outside the study window, Sir Trevor Maitland could not have been more taken aback. That his son and heir should feel anything more than a brotherly affection for the homeless girl whom he had adopted in a moment of philanthropic impulse had never occurred to him. They had grown up as children together, and Sir Trevor Maitland had not relinquished his hope of formal adoption regarding the lovely foundling. But Jack's speech showed him a new difficulty in the way, to say nothing of his wife's aversion to the idea.

"This is very sudden, my boy," he said slowly, pushing back his chair and gazing at his son gravely. "Is it not an impulse, a youthful infatuation for Ivy's beauty? Remember, dear as the girl has become to me in all these years, it is a serious matter to allow a stray child of fortune to step into your mother's place one day. The future Lady Maitland should have a name and position as assured and open as your own; you owe your family some consideration, Jack, before entertaining such a sentiment as marriage towards the poor child."

Jack Maitland's handsome, boyish face flushed and then paled, as he listened to his father's calm, judicious reasoning. But his voice was just as resolute when he replied quickly:

"You mistake me, father. Ivy herself refuses to let me speak to her of marriage until she learns the mystery of her birth. And her pride is just as strong as yours. You have only to look at her, dad, to see that there is no common blood in her. Why," he went on passionately, "she looks just as much a lady as our step-mother herself!"

Sir Trevor Maitland stiffened. "Your step-mother is a woman of irreproachable birth, Jack. Poor little Ivy is—what?"

"At present, just the one girl I love, father!" he said bravely. "But don't be afraid," he added hastily, "I shall do nothing rash or that will make you ashamed. Surely my coming to you now proves that I desire to be thoroughly open, and straightforward? Ivy and I have agreed to let matters remain as they are until I have found out who her father was and where her mother is; for she persists in believing that her mother is still alive!"

Sir Trevor shook his head sadly. "Fourteen years is a long time, Jack, my boy. And whoever the parents may be—whether well-born or obscure—there is no getting away from the fact that it was a case of intentional desertion."

"I know there are difficulties in the way, sir," Jack answered steadily. "But in unravelling this mystery I shall all the sooner win my wife."

A shadow stood in the doorway, causing both men to turn their heads, and Lady Maitland slowly came forward. She was looking exquisitely fragile, and faint rings round her violet eyes lent her an air of languor. In the bosom of her white cloth dress there were a couple of golden red leaves.

She looked keenly at the two faces before her as she sank gracefully into a chair.

"What is this solemn conclave I have disturbed?" she laughed softly. "I heard something about 'mysteries' and 'wives'—two terms that have become synonymous!"

Sir Trevor gazed at her proudly. "There is not much mystery about you, my dear!"

Lady Maitland laughed merrily. "Middle-aged women can never claim mystery, Trevor! But I have not heard yet what you were discussing."

"I was telling my father that I intended one day marrying Ivy Strange," Jack said quietly. "But she insists upon her parentage being discovered first."

The delicate brows of Sir Trevor's wife were raised in a quizzical smile. "Really quite a number of people are bitten with that young person's charms! I can hardly congratulate you upon your match, Jack, as one of the most eligible partis of the county; and Ivy Strange is what you would scarcely describe as a desirable bride for Maitland Manor's future squire!"

He reddened under her laughing sarcasm, but faced her squarely.

"I know all about that, mater; and as Ivy has as much pride as yourself, she realises it also. I am henceforth going to make it my mission to seek out all that can be traced regarding her birth."

"Poor Jack!" murmured his step-mother. "I am afraid it will be a case of tilting at windmills! But never mind," she said, patting his arm with a pretty gesture, "I trust, for your sake, that love's young dream will prove successful, and that your quest for those wonderful parents will not finish in a garret."

"Whatever I find out, mater," he said, gravely, "it will not influence my love for Ivy. But I must be off now," he said awkwardly, "I have a lot to do." Then, with a brief "Good morning," he turned on his heel and left the room.

"I am disappointed in Jack," said Sir Trevor. "I had hoped better things for him."

His wife shrugged her shoulders. "What can you expect, Trevor, when you allow a mysteriously beautiful young girl to daily throw herself at his head? Even you," she laughed, "wished to adopt the girl!"

Sir Trevor shuffled uneasily. "Adoption is not so serious an act as the elder son of Maitland Manor making her his wife! I am very fond of Ivy, but I must confess I am disappointed in Jack."

Lady Maitland rose from her chair and went to the window. Two figures passed near one of the shrubberies; it was Woolf, walking with Muriel. As her eyes fell upon the eager, upturned face of her child, Lady Maitland caught her breath sharply. Only a few hours ago, and for his dear sake she had almost——! She bit her lips, and turned to her husband.

"I will leave you now, dear. Au revoir!"

Once in her boudoir she closed the door gently and sat down.

"I wonder," she murmured silently, "who did it! Who took him, or—it—out! I am sure to know soon whether it is a friend or foe! And then——!" She raised her head, and a curiously savage look crossed her face that would have startled the admirers of Sir Trevor Maitland's wife had they seen it.

* * * * *

In the meantime Agnes Maitland was curiously examining a dirty ball of paper, half pulp, that she had taken from her step mother's toy spaniel. He had frisked after it as the wind cheated him of his prize, until he at length caught it, and prepared to make a meal. But Agnes was of an orderly nature, so she, gently and firmly, took the paper from the dog and smoothed it out. It had evidently been crushed into a ball and flung into a waste paper basket; but how it had got into the garden was a mystery. Half the words were entirely obliterated, but she could just faintly decipher one or two.

"Died," she read, and then "release," and in front of "died" were two initials, something like "V. C." or "G." she could not tell which.

"I wonder," she murmured thoughtfully, "who 'died,' and what 'release' means?" She folded the paper carefully, and put it in her purse. "I don't remember anyone with the initials 'V. C.' or 'G.,' but I may find out."

As she retraced her steps to the house later in the morning she met her maid, Mason, hurrying towards the kitchen entrance. She looked excited, and her usually quiet black eyes glittered strangely. At the sight of her mistress the woman paused for a moment, then hastened her steps.

"Mason," Agnes called sharply, the woman's manner rousing her suspicion, "where have you been?"

"I beg your pardon, miss," returned the maid, with sullen obedience, "I've been to the village to post a letter."

"That's not true!" said her mistress bluntly. "There is a post-bag that leaves the Manor twice a day, and you know that."

The woman flushed. "I'm sorry, miss," she said humbly, "I did go to post a letter, but not only for that."

"Then what for?" said Sir Trevor's elder daughter sharply. "Come; you had better be careful what you say. I will find out if it's true!"

"I went to the chemist's, miss," Mason replied. "I have suffered from toothache a lot lately, and to-day was allowed to go into the village and get some mixture. See, this is the bottle, miss," and she held up a small bottle labelled "Nerve Tonic."

Still Agnes was doubtful. She suspected her maid of concealing something, and of having used the toothache as a "blind" for a deeper object.

"Oh, yes, I see the bottle!" she remarked drily; "but I am not sure that you are telling me the truth, Mason. But you may go now," she went on, "I see you are determined to keep something from me."

She turned away, and Mason looked after her with a peculiar expression on her sallow face. "You think yourself very clever, my lady!" she muttered; "but I am not going to help you to find out much. Although I'm no friend of her ladyship's, I'll not give you any satisfaction in your prying."

She went into the house, and continued her duties methodically and satisfactorily, then finding that she had a few minutes to herself she stole to the door of Lady Maitland's boudoir, and knocked timidly three times.

"Come in!" said a low, sweet voice in reply, and Mason entered the room, slowly and deliberately.

"My lady," she said, in a respectful tone, "I have a letter for you."

Lady Maitland turned her head. "Yes, Mason, put it down."

Still the woman hesitated. She advanced nearer into the room, and lowering her voice confidentially, said, "Excuse me, your ladyship. If I give this letter up, what do I get for it?"

Lady Maitland looked at the woman in surprise; she did not often notice servants, but she could not remember having seen the face of the woman before her.

"I don't understand, Mason," she said languidly, "what you mean! I am not in the habit of 'tipping' my servants for bringing me a message."

The woman's sallow face reddened. She had not looked for such a reception; besides, the haughty curtness of her mistress made her uncertain how to proceed.

"This is no ordinary message, my lady," she said, after a pause. "I've got it from no lady or gentleman, but——"

Lady Maitland stifled a yawn with a white hand. "Proceed Mason," she said wearily, "you are very diffuse!"

"But," continued the woman slowly, fixing her long, black eyes upon the face of her beautiful mistress—"from the man that I let out of your ladyship's wardrobe last night, nearly dead!"

There was a pause, in which Lady Maitland examined her filbert nails with minute interest, while Mason began to wonder whether her mistress had heard her—or whether she had made a mistake after all!

Suddenly Sir Trevor's wife raised her eyes and fixed them upon the woman before her. "To say that your conduct shocks me, Mason, is too mild an expression. I am horrified to think that a woman of such a peculiarly unprincipled character should have been under my roof! And I am not sure that your audacity in confessing now is not part of a plan to trade on my kindness in forgiving you! Of course I must let Sir Trevor deal with you," she went on, "such subjects are distasteful to me."

The woman, caught in the coils of her own venom, made a futile effort to resist. "Indeed, my lady," she cried, "I did not lock the man in. I"—she stopped, and her mistress laughed contemptuously.

"Don't say anything more, Mason. The fact remains that the man could not have locked himself in my wardrobe without help, and you were his accomplice! Why," she went on sternly, pointing to the letter in the woman's hand, "even the man has more honesty than yourself, for he trusts you with a note to me!"

At that moment Sir Trevor entered the room.

"Ah! I was going to send for you, dear," said his wife. "I am very grieved and distressed to tell you that we have reposed a confidence in Mason that was not merited. She has confessed to me that she locked a man in my wardrobe last night, and let him out when we were at dinner. Just think of it, Trevor!" And her ladyship trembled, while her violet eyes grew moist. "We might all have been murdered in our beds!"

Her husband listened with speechless amazement; then, livid with rage, turned upon the shrinking creature.

"I've a good mind to send for the police, you hussy!" he spluttered; "you will leave this house to-day, and don't come here for a character."

The woman burst into a storm of tears, partly baffled rage, partly fear. She knew the meaning of instant dismissal. As she raised her apron to her eyes she dropped the note from her fingers, where it fluttered to Lady Maitland's feet.

"If you go now, dear," said her ladyship gravely, "I will speak to Mason. Perhaps, in a small way, I may influence her—for good." And a slight smile lurked in the corners of her mouth.

When they were alone, Lady Maitland put one white, strong hand on the sobbing woman's shoulder. "Mason," she said firmly, in a clear, sad voice, "I should be sorry to see you lose your place, and will plead with Sir Trevor to alter his decision, and allow you to make a fresh start. But," she went on slowly, "you must absolutely promise me that you will do nothing to make me regret my kindness. Avoid wrong companions; for once you make a false step you will find it difficult to shake off bad influences. Now go, and remember my words!"

"Oh, your ladyship!" gasped the woman, whose sobs were now of relief; "bless you for your kindness, and forgive me! I—I—" she added shamefacedly, "I will give you the letter."

"I don't want it, your confession will satisfy me, Mason!" replied her mistress. "I don't wish to hear anything more about the subject."

With a sudden gesture the vanquished woman seized her ladyship's hand and kissed it gratefully; then left the room.

For a moment Lady Maitland looked at the hand the woman had kissed, then taking her handkerchief she deliberately rubbed it until a red mark showed on the delicate skin.

"Bah!" she laughed contemptuously, throwing the dainty gossamer article into the fire; "that creature's touch was like the sting of a venomous reptile—only I drew the sting first!"

She laughed again—a laugh of exquisite amusement. "The fool! The poor fool! To think she could pit her cunning against my wit! Her clumsy strategy against my generalship! I fancy Mason has met more than her match."

Then, moving her foot, she stooped swiftly, and picked up something that had lain underneath it.

It was the letter Mason had dropped.

SIXTH CHAPTER

The Figure that Followed.

THE wind howled dismally among the trees, and the dead leaves whirled recklessly in semi-circles on the ground, rising—when a sudden gust seized them—for a dance in the air. Overhead, black clouds were scavenging the sky, and a pale moon sent fitful gleams through the bare branches and flickered on the stagnant water of a pond.

A tall figure, clad in some clinging black, and heavily veiled, battled against the wind, and presently paused to cast a glance behind her, where Maitland Manor lay. After a brief scrutiny, she moved on, and at the same moment another figure, also closely wrapped up, crept from behind a bush and followed swiftly behind.

At the pond's edge, near a large oak, gnarled with age, the woman stopped and looked impatiently round; but the dark was intense, and she could see nothing, a cloud having covered the face of the moon.

Suddenly a hand on her arm roused her, and turning, she encountered a pair of cunning black eyes that leered insolently into her own.

"So you are here?" she said shortly, speaking in a low, cautious tone. "I almost began to hope that—you had changed your mind!"

"It's not likely that I should lose the chance of making a deal," said the man, "'specially since I've got on a good lay. But I'm glad you 'ad the sense to come down to me, or I would 'ave gone up to you; I'm not going to be fooled this time, my fine madam!"

The woman cast a glance of such hatred and loathing at him from behind her heavy veil, that, could glances have killed, he would have been dead at her feet.

"Don't make the mistake of imagining that I am frightened of you," she said in a low, scornful voice, "that would be a waste of your time. I intended to see you at your request here, because it suited me to come; had it not done so, I would have stayed away. But I had to set you right on a certain matter!"

The man sneered. "Yes, it was to put me 'right' that you turned the lock on me the other night; ch, my 'igh and mighty lady? If it 'adn't been for your girl, you would 'ave done it too. That was one to you—to-night it is my turn!"

She bit her lip. It was gall and wormwood to her proud spirit to be at the mercy of a brute like this! But no other course had been open to her. She had read the pencilled words: "Shall expect you near the old oak in spinny to-night at twelve. Come without fail, and bring money, or shall call at Manor!" She had burnt the letter at once; and when all the household was silent, had crept like a thief in the night, to know what the man who had secured a hold over her intended doing with his knowledge.

"You are mistaken in supposing that I wished you dead," she said coldly; "you must see that your dead body in my wardrobe would be an inconvenient burden to conceal! I locked the door to prevent anyone tampering with it. But that is not the question," she continued hurriedly, "I am here for the purpose of informing you that your knowledge concerning the—convict at Dartmoor has lost its value."

The man took a backward step and peered through the gloom, trying to see whether she was jesting with him. But he saw nothing, and with a brutal gesture, he caught her arm:

"That won't wash, my lady," he hissed. "What 'as took place since yesterday to change the fact that you was the wife of a ——"

"Hush!" murmured the woman, whose hearing, acutely sensitive, had caught the sound of a broken twig. "We are being watched by someone, I know it; and discovery would be awkward for us both."

The man paused, irresolute. It was far from his intention to have his little game queered by an untoward discovery. That would be killing the goose that laid his golden eggs!

"Is that cloak and 'at yours?" he whispered. "If not, let me 'ave them!"

"No; I took them from one of the servant's rooms this evening," she answered. "They were having a party in the kitchen. What are you going to do with them?"

Without replying, the ex-convict put his hand up the trunk of the oak-tree, and felt a half-bent nail that had once supported a notice to trespassers.

"I spotted this 'ere nail this afternoon," he whispered. "Now, if I 'ang your cloak on it so as to show a bit on the ground, when the moon shines out, if anyone comes along and waits for you to turn back the same way, they will 'ave to wait a long time!"

With a grim smile at the idea of the wife of the Chief Constable of Melton being shielded by an ex-convict, she handed him the long, black cloak, which he put on the nail, and the hat just over it.

"Now, put the tail of your skirt over your 'ead," he whispered; "when we've done our bit of business, you can get back over the bridge."

Silently she followed him, walking with cautious tread. The steps behind them had suddenly ceased, for the moon had glimmered through the clouds, and the ruse of the burglar and ex-convict must have been successful.

"Who was it?" she asked herself feverishly. "Who had watched her at this hour?"

The man came to a halt suddenly. "Now, my lady, what I want and mean to get, too, is money. You accepted 'silence' yesterday, and you've got to buy it."

"You shall have money; not as a bribe, but because I promised to a certain extent to give it to you when I agreed to your terms," she said coldly. "But in my momentary panic I had forgotten that there was no need to fear you; for I am free from the shadow that stood between myself and the past."

"What d'ye mean? You aren't bluffing me again, are you? Trying to come over me with a carney trick? Becos, if yer are, ye're on the wrong tack!" and the man tightened his hold on her wrist with an ugly laugh. "Speak plain, or I'll make yer!"

A mocking smile curved the lips of the woman, as she listened to the enraged speech of the outlaw.

"I will 'speak plain,' since you wish it!" she replied. "The man—the convict you saw in that locket—is dead!"

"Dead!" he whispered. "Dead! I don't believe it! It's a lie made up to save yourself from the dock, you white devil! Don't tell me that you know 'e's dead!"

His evil face was close to hers, contorted by a hideous grimace, and in the depths of the narrow, black eyes she could read something that spelt "murder!" For an instant she almost quailed, then, pulling herself together, she laughed softly.

"Why should I lie, my good man? I had my information from the one soul who remained my friend all these years. The man died a year after his release; those were the very words. I destroyed them after reading them several times, So you see our positions are reversed. There is nothing for you to do but go away!"

"All the same," the man growled savagely, "Sir Trevor don't know that you were the wife of a convict! That might interest 'im, anyway, and you 'ardly wish that little fact to be known to 'im!"

"It does not matter in the least, now, if he did know it," she answered coolly; "he would do nothing for the sake of his name and our boy's! I am quite safe! But," she added, "I am prepared to send you twenty pounds when I hear that you have left Melton for London—anywhere—not before!"

An imprecation burst from the burglar's lips as he realised that the hold he had over her was lost. And he had imagined himself on such a good "lay" too!

"You didn't bring the 'ready' with you then?" he said sullenly.

"Not being a fool I brought nothing with me, knowing that gentlemen of your calling have a frail sense of delicacy regarding other people's property," she retorted. "Now, say whether you accept my offer—it will not be repeated."

He hesitated, and his cruel fingers itched to be at the soft, white neck gleaming in the moonlight; but twenty pounds was twenty pounds!

"'Ow shall I let you know I am in London?"

"A telegram with the words 'dress ready to send,' will be enough," she answered briefly. "I will send the money by a friend to the District Messenger Office in Regent Street, for you to call for. I shall run no risks; the money will be in gold."

Digitized by Google

She turned to go, then paused, and said: "It may interest you to learn that the police are much concerned in you just now. Melton is not a safe hiding-place!"

As the gloom hid her from sight, the baffled man sent an oath, strong and venomous, after her.

"Yes, my fine madam, you've scored again, but I'll get my own back one day! To think that after 'anging on all these years, my old pard should kick the bucket just when 'is life 'ad got so valuable!"

He moved away, then a sudden thought struck him, and he laughed grimly. "I'll find out for myself whether there is bunkum in it or not! Then, if I discover she has done me in the eye—my lady will pay for it twice over, in more than money!"

* * * * * *

The great hall-clock struck half-past twelve as the mistress of Maitland Manor stepped softly into the dining-room, through the long French windows. She had left them on the latch when she went out, but someone had passed through since, for they were difficult to open at first, as though they had been pulled violently to.

She closed them firmly, then felt under the rug where she had taken the precaution of hiding the key, in case malicious persons should tamper with it. As she turned it in the lock, she smiled grimly, as though tickled by a previous occasion on which she had done the same thing; only then, it was to keep an enemy in; this time it was to keep an enemy—out!

"Now," she murmured softly, "if my suspicions are right, that some person followed me out of the house, I shall know! I hope, whoever it was, that the cold night air will occasion no serious results!"

With a low laugh she stole up the wide stairway into her room, where a dim light was burning. The shutters were up to her windows, preventing the light from being noticed outside.

She undressed quickly, cleaning the mud from her shoes with paper that she afterwards burnt, and in a very short time was fast asleep—one white arm flung over her head, and a smile of unusual sweetness on her lips!

The air grew more chilly as time slipped by, and the waiting figure in the spinny, watching for the woman to come from behind the old oak, shivered with the cold that struck a chill to her lean body.

"If I were not certain," she muttered, "that it was she whom I saw from my bedroom-window cross the lawn to-night, I would not wait; but I know there is some mystery afloat, and I mean to fathom it! She can't be long now, and as the clouds have cleared, I shall see her face in the moonlight. She can't escape me; I shall know!"

She cowered down again in her hiding-place, patient and revengeful, nursing the thoughts of her enemy's discomfiture when her treachery should be revealed. Presently the crisp, dry leaves and twigs stirred and crackled ominously, as though heavy steps were treading them down. The heart of the waiting woman beat high with excitement! at last she would run the principals in this secret meeting to earth—find out the reason of the midnight rendezvous.

The steps drew nearer to her hiding-place. Cautiously she stole forward, and looked up. It was a man, walking briskly as though in a hurry. She could not catch more than a passing glimpse of his face, but she saw it was dark and sallow, and that his black eyes glittered cruelly, while round his neck she noticed a red muffler.

The man passed on and again the silence grew intense, fraught with a hundred different voices of the wood—myriads of personalities seemed to people the earth, yet not one sound reached the expectant ears of the woman who watched for the figure behind the old oak to come forward.

At last she rose slowly from her crouching attitude, and stretched her stiffened limbs that ached, and stood irresolute, her eyes fixed upon the cloak that she could see distinctly in the clear moonlight—motionless and sombre, like a gaunt shadow.

A sudden thought struck her, gripping her in a fearful terror. Suppose the woman that wore that cloak had met with death—had faced the Unknown, while she had waited to accuse her—of what?

With a shiver she stole towards the old oak, a clammy moisture bursting out all over her at the thought of what lay on the other side. She knelt down and touched the cloak with timid fingers. She felt nothing under her hand except the stuff she held. With renewed courage she went closer; then, after a brief inspection of the tree, she knew she had been outwitted by a clever ruse, a practical joke that had cost her an hour and a half of sleep, all for nothing! The woman for whom she had waited was represented by a hat and cloak hanging on a nail.

She smiled bitterly at the sudden well of sympathy that had risen in her. Fooled by the woman she had hoped to humble! How she must be laughing at her now! She turned towards the Manor with trembling limbs, feeling in each tree she passed a witness of her mortification!

As she stepped across the lawn she glanced up at the house. All was dark and chill, and with a sensation of having wasted her time, she went towards the long French windows of the dining-room.

Half an hour afterwards Maitland Manor was in a state of confusion, and the subject of interest was the fainting figure of Agnes Maitland, who had dropped insensible on the threshold as the door was opened by a frightened maid, in answer to repeated peals of the bell. When she recovered consciousness Agnes met the kindly gaze of her stepmother, who, lovely in white negligée, was bending over her.

"Dear Agnes!" she said, "what does this mean? I thought all the household was in bed ages ago. I woke up suddenly, thinking the Manor was on fire!"

The eyes of the two women met—Lady Maitland's innocent and anxious; her stepdaughter's suspicious and puzzled.

"I don't know," she answered, averting her gaze. "I know I used to walk in my sleep, but I thought I had broken off the habit. But now it seems it has returned."

Lady Maitland laughed softly. "Yes, dear, it looks very like it, but you must not let these bad habits return! I shall have to watch you and follow you next time."

"There will be no 'next time,' Lady Maitland," replied Agnes sullenly, feeling that she was at a disadvantage. "I will see that I keep my eyes open!" And she threw a meaning emphasis into her words.

Once again inside her room, and Maitland Manor restored to silence, her ladyship laughed noiselessly. "That has done her good! She will think twice before following me again!"

At that moment, when her maid, Mason, was putting her into bed, Agnes Maitland looked at her closely.

"Mason," she said, drinking the hot milk that had been prescribed for her, "when you were in the village this morning, did you see anything of a stranger in Melton—a dark, loafing-looking man, with a red handkerchief round his neck?"

The woman started, and came towards the bed with dilated eyes.

"A red handkerchief, did you say, miss?" she exclaimed. "I'm not sure, miss—I—I—don't notice people much!"

To herself the woman was thinking:

"What is the meaning of it? Has he spoken to her, too?"

SEVENTH CHAPTER.

The Brand of the Broad Arrow.

"I WONDER if I may ask you to do something for me while you are in town, Mr. North? It is a very slight thing, but it requires a friend to accomplish it."

"Indeed, you can depend upon me to do anything for you within my power, in fact, anything outside my power, as well," Heriot North answered, a glad glow within him that he should be honoured by a commission from the peerless wife of Sir Trevor Maitland.

She laughed lightly. "It is nothing very serious. I have a few poor hangers on to my charity, and one in particular—a very deserving man—is in great need of help, I hear, and I thought you might leave a letter from me at 269, Regent Street, a District Messenger Depôt, I believe, where the poor creature has written me from. I cannot send a cheque, for the reason that he has no banking account, so you will not mind gold, will you?" And she smiled sweetly into his face.

"Of course not, Lady Maitland," he replied. "I can hardly express to you that it is a great honour you have conferred upon me. I will be only too glad to serve you in any way, always and at any time you may desire it."

"'Always, and at any time'?" she laughed gaily. "I shall remind you of that promise one day, Mr. North; then you may regret having made it."

"Never!" he breathed fervently, and in after days that promise came back with a terrible significance.

"I suppose you return to India shortly?" Lady Maitland said lightly, flashing a keen glance at him from under her lashes.

"I don't think I shall ever return to India," he replied gravely. "This morning I received an offer to take up the editorship of a big paper in Bombay; I am not sure that I care about it—now."

"Have you seen Agnes yet?" queried her ladyship quietly. "The poor girl has been quite an age in bed with the chill she caught when walking in her sleep the other night. It was most unfortunate!" And the firelight playing on her face sent a distorted smile into her eyes.

"I have not seen her for several days," he answered carelessly. "I am sorry she is ill. But it is not for Agnes that I came to inquire to-day, Lady Maitland!"

"No," she murmured softly, "what then?"

He leant forward, his eyes fixed upon hers with a yearning she did not notice. "It was to ask you whether I should do well to accept that offer for Bombay. I do not require the money, I have enough to satisfy me now. But I would go, even then, unless I knew that——"

"Ah, North, how are you? Glad you've come in to have a chat with us," and Sir Trevor Maitland entered the room, accompanied by his son Woolf. Heriot North concealed his chagrin at the untimely entrance of his host. He had hoped for a tête-à-tête with the mistress of Maitland Manor.

Woolf crossed over to his mother, whose eyes lit up with a tender light as the boy laid his head on her knee. "Oh, mummie! What do you think? Parkins told father that he saw a man in the spinny the other night, and he was sure that it was the same man who was in the grounds."

"Yes," broke in Sir Trevor, turning to his wife. "It is most extraordinary, my dear. Parkins declares there was a woman with him also. I am going to have a regular search made. There appears to be a gang about."

Lady Maitland laughed softly, and Heriot North thought he had never seen her look so fair and sweet.

"A woman, did you say, Trevor? I wonder whether it was Agnes walking in her sleep that Parkins saw the other night!" And her eyes flashed with amusement.

Sir Trevor shook his head gravely. "No, Pearl, I think not. She was tall, and was deep in conversation with him also. Besides, Parkins found a——"

Lady Maitland moved slightly, and raised her fan to her face to shield it from the fire. Her skin was very delicate.

"This is getting quite interesting," she laughed gaily. "What did he find, Trevor?"

"A piece of jewellery, my dear. I shall be passing the lodge to-morrow, and will bring it back with me. Parkins did not know whether he ought to have brought it himself."

His wife put a slim, white hand to her neck thoughtfully. "Ah, by the way, I promised to send some needlework down to the lodge to-morrow. I might go down myself, dear, and spare you the trouble."

As her husband turned again to their guest, with a remark about the meet for the following day, Lady Maitland lay back among her cushions, thinking deeply. She knew the effect her beauty had upon the imagination of Heriot North, who, for many years, had had but a limited acquaintance with the feminine sex.

"I fancy he might be useful to me," she thought. "He is quite quixotic, and has an exalted idea of the clinging loveliness of my sex! Yes, he most decidedly would do anything for me, and ask no questions!"

When Heriot rose to go, she was standing in the window, gazing out with pensive eyes.

"Good-bye, Mr. North," she said, gently, placing her hand in his, where it lay like a snowflake, cool and light. "I think you have spent quite enough time in India," she went on, "you must give your friends in England a chance now."

He bent over her hand silently. He had received his first command from Sir Trevor Maitland's haughty wife.

"Thank you, Lady Maitland," he replied simply. "I shall always be at the service of—my friends."

She smiled slightly. It amused her to receive the homage of this courtly man.

"When may I expect your commission for town?" he said, lowering his voice.

She raised her eyes to his, swiftly. "I will send it by messenger to-morrow to the Hollies," she replied clearly.

As they moved towards the door a pair of cruel, spiteful eyes followed them from behind the shelter of a screen.

The opposite end of the long drawing-room was bright with firelight and the sound of laughter, but the watcher on the other side of the screen was in darkness.

"So she is using him, now!" she muttered. "I wonder what she is sending to the 'Hollies' that he should take to town? I shall find out somehow."

As Lady Maitland rejoined the group round the hearth, a slight figure slipped noiselessly from behind the screen, and left the room.

* * * * * *

"Good morning, Mrs. Parkins; is Ivy Strange in? Tell her I want to speak with her," and Lady Maitland smiled graciously upon the plump, homely wife of the lodge-keeper.

The woman curtsied with pleasure and excitement. A visit from "her ladyship" was an event that did not happen twice in a year.

"Good morning, your leddyship," she stuttered, wiping her red hands quickly on an apron. "Ivy went out just a second ago, your leddyship, but said she would be back almost immediate, your leddyship. Will your leddyship take a chair?"

Lady Maitland smiled again. "Yes, Mrs. Parkins, I will wait just a second or two. I shall enjoy a warm by your bright fire this cold day."

Bristling with gratified importance, Mrs. Parkins brought a chair from the "parlour," and wiped it with her apron; then placed it in front of the roaring fire in the kitchen.

Lady Maitland sat down, and gazed round with smiling interest.

"This is very cheerful, Mrs. Parkins. You have a nice little home here."

The woman flushed with pleasure. "Thank you, your leddyship," she said. "Can I do anything else for your leddyship?"

"Nothing more, except to tell me whether you and Parkins have all you want. I like to make everyone near me happy," replied the sweet voice of her visitor. "Perhaps a basket of things from the Manor kitchen will be acceptable; warm soup on a cold evening is very comforting!" and her ladyship's smile sent a grateful glow through the lodge-keeper's wife.

"It's very good of your leddyship, marm!" she murmured. "The very words Parkins said to me the other night was that 'e wished 'e 'ad a little something 'ot for 'is supper."

"Had he been out long?" queried Lady Maitland.

"Yes, your leddyship; sometimes 'e goes round the grounds with one of the gamekeepers. And that night it was that 'e saw a man in the spinny talkin' to a woman!"

"Why did he not stop the man, Mrs. Parkins?" said her visitor; "surely it was dangerous to leave them?"

The woman hesitated. "You see, me leddy, Parkins was not armed, and for all 'e knew, the man might 'ave 'ad fire-arms. But 'e didn't waste 'is time, your leddyship, for 'e picked up something on the very spot afterwards. A pearl brooch, 'e must 'ave stole it, Parkins thinks, yer leddyship. But 'e 'as it to give to the squire."

"Surely, Mrs. Parkins, your husband is not going about with that brooch in his pocket!" exclaimed Lady Maitland. "It would be fatal if it were lost, as it will be most useful in the evidence, should the man be caught."

The woman smiled proudly. "Yer leddyship need 'ave no fear of that. Parkins brought it straight in 'ere, and puts it in the very last place where any thief would look for it!"

"And where is this wonderful place, Mrs. Parkins?" replied Lady Maitland graciously.

"There, on the mantel, inside that vase, your leddyship, and there it will stay until the squire 'as it. Shall I show it your leddyship?"

Lady Maitland shook her head, and stifled a yawn, prettily. "No, I don't think it had better be touched until the proper time, Mrs. Parkins." Then she said, "I am afraid it is getting rather late, and unless Ivy comes soon, I must be going. I wonder can you find someone to run up to the Manor and ask for the parcel I left on the oak settle in the hall? It is work for Ivy."

"Yes; your leddyship," the woman said eagerly. "I will find someone, or go myself; if your leddyship will excuse me leavin' you!"

She smiled graciously, and watched the lodge-keeper's wife hurry away. Then, with a sudden gesture, Lady Maitland rose from the chair, and took something down from the mantel. She emptied what it contained into her hand, smiling as she recognised the object of her search. She replaced the vase, slipped her hand into her pocket, and, after a slight pause, left the lodge, and strolled slowly up the drive. Half way up she saw Mrs. Parkins coming down.

"I stood by the gate after you had gone, Mrs. Parkins," her ladyship smiled, "then grew tired of waiting for that naughty girl! You must tell her to do that work quickly for me." Then, with a gracious gesture, she dismissed the woman.

When she was in her dressing-room, Lady Maitland unlocked her jewel-case and flung something into it, locking it again then putting it away. "I have not done a bad morning's work, after all," she murmured, thoughtfully, "and yet it was a very simple thing that I did!"

She changed her dress and went down to lunch, at peace with the world and herself. In the hall she met Agnes, now well again.

"Ah, Agnes, dear!" she said sweetly; "I wonder whether you are going out for a drive this afternoon? If so, will you do something for me?"

Agnes looked at her doubtfully. "What purpose had she for asking a favour of her?" She felt that something was beneath all this openness—that her step-mother had a reason for wishing her out of the way.

"I'm not sure," she replied curtly; "I did not intend going out. What do you wish done?" she added curiously.

Lady Maitland shrugged her shoulders. "Oh, since you are not using the carriage, I will do my commission myself," she replied carelessly. "It was merely to leave a small parcel of miniatures at Mr. North's place, 'The Hollies.' He is going to London to-morrow, he told us yesterday, and offered to do anything for me, so I thought it a good opportunity to give him the miniatures that I wanted copied. He knows a good place, I believe."

Agnes' face fell. After all, she had listened to a very innocent conversation yesterday, or—and she bit her lip—was her step-mother laughing at her?

At dinner, Sir Trevor turned suddenly to his wife. "Pearl, dear, I forgot to inquire whether you brought back that brooch, or whatever it was, from the lodge this morning."

Lady Maitland started, and looked apologetically across the table.

"Dear, I'm so sorry, but I entirely forgot to ask for it! I went down to the lodge, and chatted with Mrs. Parkins while waiting for Ivy, to give her instructions about the needlework; but when she did not come in—being probably otherwise engaged," and she shot a swift glance at Jack, who flushed hotly, "I could not wait any longer and came away."

"Never mind, my dear," he replied kindly, not liking to see her blame herself; "I will go down this evening after dinner."

Lady Maitland smiled. "Very well, Trevor. Perhaps, after all, you are the best person to receive anything of that nature."

But, deep down in her heart, she laughed at the memory of the locked box upstairs.

* * * * *

"Mrs. Parkins, I want to ask you something; and if you do all you can to help me, you shall be a bridesmaid at my wedding!"

"Lor'! Mr. Jack!" smiled Mrs. Parkins, as the son and heir to Maitland Manor settled himself down easily in the very chair that had been occupied the day before by his lovely step-mother; "'ow you do go on, sir! But if there is anything I can ever do for you, sir—me and Parkins, that is—we would crawl on our 'ands and knees to do it! That we would!"

Jack laughed, and puffed at his cigarette for a few seconds. Then he spoke, and this time he did not joke. "I don't want you to crawl on your hands and knees, Mrs. Parkins—that would only worry me. But I wish you, instead, to crawl back, mentally, fourteen years, and tell me what you remember about that day I found Ivy under the lodge wall."

"Goodness gracious, Mr. Jack!" exclaimed Mrs. Parkins; "whatever makes you ask me such a question now?"

He leant forward and touched the hard, horny hand that lay on the woman's lap. "I ask you that, Mrs. Parkins," he said, gravely, "because I have a great interest in the subject; because one day I hope to make Ivy my wife; but she refuses to let me say anything about marriage until she learns the worst—or the best—about her birth. So I am going to find out what I can; and I begin with you."

During his speech, the lodge-keeper's wife had gazed at him open-mouthed. That he, the future squire—Sir John Maitland, of Melton—should stoop to woo the little foundling that Sir Trevor had had brought up with Miss Muriel, was a surprise so startling, that it took her fully several minutes to recover.

"What! Mr. Jack!" she murmured; "are you serious, sir? Whatever will the squire and 'is lady say?"

"I marry to please myself, Mrs. Parkins," and a note of hauteur crept into Jack Maitland's voice. "My father and step-mother think it is only an infatuation on my part, but they don't know me yet! Now, to come to the subject," he continued; "the first thing to ask you is whether you still have the clothes that Ivy was found in? Although it was I who picked the little mite up, I was only a boy of eleven at the time, and can barely remember anything but the fact."

"Well, sir," she murmured thoughtfully, seeing that he was in earnest, "I can't say as 'ow I did keep the few things she was found in; they was mostly ragged, sir, although it was plain to me, even then, that Ivy was no common child! And when Sir Trevor persuaded 'is lady to let the girl stay with me, and go up to the Manor every day to learn with Miss Muriel, I just settled down with 'er, quite happy like, bless 'er heart! Why, sir, she's grow'd up almost as lovely as 'er leddyship herself—if I'm not makin' too bold," she added hastily.

"Lovelier, to my mind!" Jack murmured. Then he said aloud: "So you have nothing belonging to her, Mrs. Parkins, not even a few beads that were round her neck, or a jacket with a mark, or—anything that might lead to a clue?"

Mrs. Parkins shook her head. "I don't remember beads nor nuffin, sir, but I'll 'ave a look in my old box to-morrow," she added quickly, seeing a cloud on his face. Suddenly she started and exclaimed excitedly:

"Stop, sir! I forgot! There is one thing that might 'elp you, if you are bent on findin' out the past! But you must promise never to let on to Ivy that I told you, for the dear bairn don't know 'erself, she's that innercent."

Jack paled, and his eyes grew anxious. What was he to learn about his poor little darling?

"I promise you," he replied quickly, "that she shall know nothing from me!"

Mrs. Parkins paused. "You see, sir, it was little more than a year after Sir Trevor brought 'ome 'is second lady to the Manor, that you found Ivy outside the lodge. Well, she was such a tot, only three, that I took no notice at first to think about looking for anything about 'er particular; for we was all took up with 'er leddyship's wonderful beauty and goodness in the village. But one night, sir——"

She paused to breathe, for Mrs. Parkins was a plump, short-throated dame, and quick speech was not easy to her.

"Go on," said Jack impatiently, his fair brow suddenly becoming moist. "What happened?"

"Nothin' 'appened, sir. But in combing the little love's beautiful, curly 'air one night, I come across a mark, on 'er forehead, right up under 'er curls, 'idden away-like, and the sight of it—faint and red—gave me and Parkins quite a turn!"

"What mark?" said Jack hoarsely; "for Heaven's sake, Mrs. Parkins, don't keep me in suspense! Why should a mark or scar give you a 'turn'?"

"Because, Mr. Jack, sir," replied the woman impressively, leaning forward and sinking her voice to a whisper; "because the mark on little Ivy's brows was the same as you see on them poor critters what figures in pictures in the magazines sometimes. It was a government mark, sir, Parkins said, the very spit of a broad arrow!"

(Another long instalment next week.)

"I do my spring cleaning at all seasons of the year." "How is that?" "I am a watchmaker."

The Visitor (viewing the new baby): "Do you think he is going to resemble his father?" The Mother: "I shouldn't be surprised. He keeps me up every night."

Miss Scraggs: "Yes, once when I was out alone on a dark night I saw a man, and, oh! my goodness, how I ran!" Little Willie: "And did you catch him, sister?"

Professor (to class): "Now, who can tell me the most wonderful achievement of the present century? Miss Morris, I see your hand raised." Miss Morris (proudly): "My sister Nellie has taught her pug dog, Thistle, to smoke."

A mistress told her maid that she must not always do things on her responsibility, but first ask permission. The next day Betty walked into the parlour, and said politely: "Ma'am, the cat is busy eating up the duck in the pantry. May I send her away or not?"

Little Dot: "I made a doll's swing to-day, an' I asked Ethel May to lend me her doll to try it with, an' she wouldn't do it. She's just the meanest, stingiest thing I ever saw." Little Dick: "Why didn't you use your own doll?" Little Dot: "I was afraid it might fall!"

"I must confess," explained a young woman, "that I grow weary of hearing those people talk about their family tree." "I have observed," replied Miss Cayenne, "that family trees are very much like ordinary trees. The old substantial stock is not shaken by any breeze. The more recent and unimportant twigs do all the rustling."

I would draw your special attention to the fact that I am offering two billiard tables, together with cues, balls, and all other accessories, as prizes in the new Competition which begins on the next page. The billiard tables will make a welcome addition to any room about 13ft. square, and will go on an ordinary dining-table. As regards the Competition itself, it is quite the most fascinating one we have had in Short Stories recently, as readers will see.

The last list of sentences but one in the Buried Names of Stations Competition appears on page 725; the last list, together with the closing date of the competition, will be published next week.

I am giving you another long instalment of "The Bond Between" this week. I do not doubt that my readers enjoyed the prologue and chapters which were published last week, and have been anxiously awaiting this number to learn further developments in the story. Anyone who has not yet started it can do so by reading the comprehensive summary of last week's instalment on the first page of the paper.

I have just received a most interesting letter, from which the following is an extract:—

"I do so wish I had had the opportunity of reading 'The Confessions of a Self-Made Girl' earlier in my life. Like Maud Cardew, I was seized with the desire to make a name in the world, and left my country home for London, where, unfortunately, being ignorant of the ways of a big city, I fell into some of the pitfalls that are so abundant. Happily I came through all right, but only after terrible experiences, of which I now shudder to think. Though I have not been quite such a success as Maud Cardew was, I have made as good a position as I desire. I do so hope you will print this letter, so that girls, thinking of going to London or other big cities, who only read the 'Confessions' from the story point of view, may re-read them and take to heart the advice contained therein."

Comment on this letter is, I think, unnecessary.

Particulars of the competition especially for ladies, about which I told you last week, will be found on page 717.

It is not really much trouble to buy a postal order or stamps, put them in an envelope, stamp and address it, and then post it, but yet how many people find it so. Just because they won't take this small amount of trouble it means that a number of little slum children have to forego their one red-letter day in the whole year—the day which they should spend in the country. It only costs ninepence to give one child a happy day, and that is a sum which I am sure most of my readers could afford.

As soon as you have read this column, put the paper down, go out to the nearest post office, buy nine penny stamps—or a postal order, if you can afford more—write your name and address on a piece of notepaper, put this, together with the stamps or postal order, in an envelope, which stamp and address to the Hon. Sec., Fresh Air Fund, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. After you have done that you will feel that you can sit down with a clear conscience to enjoy reading the rest of the paper. I hope all my readers will act on this piece of advice.

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Below you will find twelve sets of letters, each of which contains the name of a Railway Station in the United Kingdom (not necessarily using all the letters). You must write (in ink) in the space left for that purpose the longest name you can make by rearranging the letters.

The name containing the greatest number of letters will be the correct solution. If, however, more than one such name can be made out of one set of letters, each will be counted correct.

All the names will be found in the Index to Railway Stations in the January (1903) edition of Bradshaw's Guide. Should you be unable to obtain a copy of this Guide, a reprint of the Index will be sent to you for three penny stamps on application to BRADSHAW'S GUIDE, 59 Fleet Street, London, E.C.; or ROOM EIGHT, "SHORT STORIES," 17 and 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

The first prize of £25 will be given to the competitor who fills in the greatest number of railway stations under the conditions stated. The second prize of £10 will go to the person who fills in the next greatest number, and the other prizes will be awarded in order of merit.

When you have filled in all the names you can find, take out this page and keep it by you. Don't on any account send it to us until the closing date is announced in "SHORT STORIES."

In the event of a tie a further set (or, if necessary, several further sets) of letters will be submitted to the tieing competitors until one wins the first prize outright.

DR. PERCIVAL'S PRESCRIPTION.

Telling of the Happiness a Lost Photograph Brought.

"I cannot tell what's the matter with the girl," remarked Mrs. Folliott crossly to her husband at the breakfast table. "Once upon a time she was punctual at meals, cheerful as a lark, and altogether a happy, light-hearted creature. And now she is quite changed. She has hardly a word to say for herself, moons listlessly about the house, and gives me a lot of anxiety."

"Try a month at Brighton," suggested old Folliott, who also had noticed his daughter's altered demeanour. "I expect West Kensington is getting on her nerves."

"Charles, don't be flippant. I am informed by Dr. Percival that the air of this locality is quite admirable, and as for your suggestion about Brighton, you seem to forget that Maude was there for nearly three weeks not long ago, and came home looking worse than ever."

"In that case," remarked Mr. Folliott gravely, "perhaps you had better take the girl to see Dr. Percival."

Later in the day Maude appeared, looking intensely unhappy. Her mother made no remark to the girl until she had sat for some moments in silence. She then broke the stillness by saying that she intended taking her to the doctor that very afternoon.

"He can't do me any good," said Maude, in a low, quivering tone. "Nobody can."

"Nonsense. A sound tonic will set you on your feet again, and bring some colour to your cheeks. You must certainly do what I suggest."

It therefore came to pass that Dr. Percival's consulting-room was invaded that afternoon by Mrs. Folliott and her daughter. That worthy physician, who had known the girl since infancy, took considerable interest in her case; but after sundry professional queries, admitted that he could find nothing radically wrong.

"Needs a tonic, perhaps," he said, as he seated himself at the table and wrote a prescription.

When the visitors had taken their leave the doctor picked up something that had fallen from Miss Maude's reticule when she took out her handkerchief. It was the photograph of a young and exceedingly good-looking concert singer, Noel Vane, who was rapidly making a big reputation in the musical world.

On the back of the portrait were written these words in Maude's girlish hand—

"O darling, darling, if only we could meet."

"Oho!" pondered the doctor, with a roguish smile, "so that's the cause of the young lady's illness, is it?"

Presently an inspiration flashed through his genial brain. He sat down and wrote to Mrs. Folliott as follows—

"Dear Mrs. Folliott—Since handing you my prescription this afternoon it has occurred to me that what your daughter needs quite as much as physic is change and amusement. I happen to be on the committee of a concert to be given at the Town Hall in aid of our local hospital, and I have much pleasure in inclosing a couple of tickets for the entertainment, which I hope you will both be able to attend. I further inclose a programme of the performance, and hoping to see you there, remain—Yours very faithfully, "Claude Percival."

Now, when the letter was read to Maude, she showed little interest therein, until her eyes encountered the programme which the doctor had forwarded. Then a flush came upon her cheek, for in large, bold type, she saw the name "Mr. Noel Vane."

"I—I shall certainly go, mother," she exclaimed, and Mrs. Folliott was amazed to perceive the sudden change that had transfigured her daughter; "and, do you know, I—I feel better already."

"Then that tonic has begun to work wonders very quickly," exclaimed Mrs. Folliott.

* * * * *

"Miss Folliott. Let me present to you Mr. Noel Vane, whom you have heard this evening."

Maude flushed with delight. A moment later she and the young tenor were chatting in a corner, and she was telling him how his voice had delighted her at all times.

"So pleased to hear you say so," he remarked, eyeing her with a glance that held deep admiration. "Er—I am singing at another concert in this neighbourhood next week, and should be delighted if you and your mother would come."

Maude murmured her thanks, whilst Mrs. Folliott, who now strolled towards them, was much gratified at being introduced to the leading singer of the evening.

In the days that followed Maude made steady progress in the direction of health. Mrs. Folliott commented on the "tonic" more than once, and told Maude that she was overjoyed at its success.

Maude smiled. She did not venture to disillusionise her mother by pointing out that the medicine had been used to water the plants, and that not a single drop had found its way down her throat. Yet such was the case, and it was the sequel to the doctor's prescription which was working the change in her, not the prescription itself.

Young Noel Vane soon afterwards became a frequent visitor at Folliott House, where he was made exceedingly welcome. And in the fulness of time Maude sought her mother, and said shyly—

"Mother, I'm engaged to be married."

"Indeed," cried the elder lady, assuming her glasses with an imperious manner. "This is a trifle sudden, I imagine. May I inquire who is the gentleman?"

"It's—it's Noel Vane," replied Maude, with a blush. "We—we always liked each other from the first."

Mrs. Folliott was considerably relieved. She had always feared that Reggie Howard, an impecunious city clerk, had won her daughter's affections, and it was a relief to find that her suspicions were wrong.

Next morning Dr. Percival happened to be passing the house as Miss Folliott emerged, drawing on her gloves.

"Aha, good morning, good morning, my dear," he exclaimed heartily. "You are looking quite well again."

"I am quite well again," she replied with a happy smile.

The doctor's acute gaze fixed itself upon a certain ring which lay upon her third finger, a ring that he had not noticed when she had consulted him three months before.

"Engaged, eh?" he said, with a twinkle in his eye. "Let me congratulate you."

She thanked him, and went on to tell him what had happened. The twinkle in the medico's eye deepened as the story was unfolded.

"I'm glad I prescribed that concert for you," he said at length, "and that reminds me that there is a certain photograph, belonging to you, which I picked up in my surgery. I ought to have returned it to you long ago."

Maude blushed very red.

"Oh, doctor!" she cried. "I had been wondering where I dropped it. Then it was you who——"

She broke off suddenly, as the true explanation of the doctor's conduct flashed across her brain.

"It was very, very good of you," she said gratefully, and then added with a laugh, "What do I owe you for your services?"

"A slice of wedding cake!" replied Dr. Percival promptly.

And in due course the fee was paid!

The Abduction of the Millionaire.

Being the third of six stories told in the Brighton Express and now related

BY

WINIFRED GRAHAM.

The train steamed out of the station and stopped.

"We are creeping to-night," said Stourbridge.

"Harford, it's your turn for a story," declared Mr. Carter.

"Oh! I am not going to shirk my share of our little causerie," he replied.

And this is the tale he told:

Benjamin Pimento came of a money-making race, a race which, through long ages, has been noted, not for any special nationality, but for annexing every nation's wealth.

Benjamin's immediate relatives had not kept up the reputation of his race, in much the same way that some thoroughbred horses, instead of gracing a racecourse, find themselves in a hansom cab.

His parents had evidently transmitted their whole stock of wit, capacity, and method, unused, to their offspring. They were too apathetic for the keen, hurrying world into which they introduced young Benjamin.

It had outrun them in the eager chase for gold, and they were left dazed and bewildered at the starting post.

Thus they were living in poverty, instead of enjoying their natural birthright—wealth.

But Benjamin was a true Pimento—he was not destined to pass his career in the narrow straits of that struggling couple to whom he owed his existence. The blood of his forefathers ran strongly and swiftly in his veins, and that he would return to the fold, and prove his breed, was shown at the early age of three.

His mother missed him one morning, and an active search was at once commenced, but it was not amongst his infantile playmates that the boy was eventually discovered. He had found his way to the back of a tumble-down wooden shed, and was holding up his little pinafore, in which to place the loose, rusty nails. His small fingers were busily employed pulling them one by one out of the old rotten edifice.

When asked what he was doing, his natural business talents were displayed by announcing that he was going to sell them to the ironmonger. These propensities developed with age, and from picking out rusty nails in the rotten shed, he rose to collecting old clothes from those who had no further use for them, and selling them to others who had. The trade was a profitable one, and for a time he gave it his fullest energies, since the buying and selling pleased him. In fact he grew to be one of the cleverest and most distinguished members of the Old Clothes Exchange.

In this line he would certainly have possessed himself eventually of a fair fortune, but his ambition soared far above being cramped by the walls of Houndsditch. He longed for something better—his soul yearned to be great—and honoured—looked up to by all men. He wanted to make a position for himself—to fashion his life in a loftier mould. He had brains, and would use them, so he determined upon sailing for the land of gold and diamonds. There he might gather stores of rough gems as he once did rusty nails.

He went out confident of success, brimful of hope and energy. Youth is ever sanguine of prosperity when it first embarks on the sea of fortune. But as for collecting diamonds like nails, Benjamin was disappointed. Yet he found by obtaining them from the natives who had no right to possess them, their cost was small and their sale price large.

Benjamin Pimento did not labour in vain, but by these means soon became rich. With his brilliant business talents and cash capital, he grasped the many opportunities offering in the new land of gold.

Good fortune seemed to lie in his path, and in an amazingly short time he found himself a millionaire, and returned gilded to the great City of London.

But money was not all that he desired. He still had some vast ideas of progress to attain the goal of his ambition. Unlike so many of his race, who only live for greed of hard cash, Benjamin Pimento determined to become a factor in finance, which would soon obtain for him the social position he coveted.

Already the matrimonial market had raised him to a higher rung on Society's ladder. He had married the youngest daughter of a patrician family, whose pedigree was longer than their banking account. The exchange was fair enough—wealth for birth, and the fair bride was not above loving her self-made husband. She spurred him on to loftier aims; she also lived chiefly for the esteem of men. They were well-matched, these two natures, each craving for distinction, and coveting the good opinion of their fellows.

Benjamin's policy, tact, and self-possession had through many a crisis held him in good stead; he was known to be a man of his word, a just master, a true friend.

He opened large offices in the City, and attempted to rival the Bank of England by making his own Consols and Bank. By this means his name became well-known, stockbrokers and West End speculators worshipping at his shrine.

One of the consequences of this notoriety was that he laid himself open to various attempts at fraud.

His partner, Mr. Foster, a shrewd man of the world, whom he had chosen with great judgment, protected him from many wiles, but their name was legion.

They had been discussing these attempts one evening before leaving the office, and had come to the conclusion that someone connected with their staff was divulging business secrets.

"It's very serious," said Foster, wrinkling his brow, as he followed Mr. Pimento downstairs.

"Can you come to the Gaiety to-night? I am dining first with Lord Brackwell, and taking him on there. Look us up if you have nothing better to do. Box A."

"Thanks, I'm afraid I can't manage it. I am engaged to-night."

"See you in the morning, then," said Pimento, as he stepped into his mail-phæton, gathered up the reins, and dashed away with his splendid roans.

Mr. Foster watched him, perhaps a trifle enviously, as he hailed his humble hansom.

"He's a good fellow," he said to himself, "and deserves to be rich. It must be rather gratifying to be run after and gaped at, to be a millionaire and honest—almost an anomaly! I don't suppose there is a more popular man in the City than Ben Pimento, even the rich can stand him."

And that was saying a great deal for the diamond king.

Lord Brackwell was a friend who wanted nothing out of Pimento; he was not one of the aristocratic but impoverished blood-suckers, who only too frequently settled like leeches on Ben and his wife.

He admired his sterling qualities, found his stories of South Africa diverting and amusing, for Ben could be good company, and was very well informed. Besides this, Lord Brackwell was a second cousin of Mrs. Pimento.

They dined together at the "Berkeley," where Benjamin Pimento was a well-known figure.

"You look tired, old man," said Lord Brackwell, with the familiar ease characteristic of him. "You overdo yourself—think too much, eh? There is such a quantity of matter packed into your brain, enough to break it. I avoid the City always; it seems such a nerve-destroying hole."

Pimento smiled.

"Yes, I have a fair amount on my mind for the moment, but nothing connected with finance could ever seem irksome to me. I was born to it, you know; it is the sap of my life, the foundation of my being. I meet with a good many difficulties from time to time. At the present moment Foster and I are ferreting out a veritable snake in the grass. As yet we have said nothing, but I can't stand underhand dealings. I would far rather be brought into contact with highway robbers than office thieves. The first defy, the others cringe, which I hate."

"But the good old days of roadside desperadoes are over; we are no longer attacked on the Queen's highway with a horse-pistol at our heads."

"There are crimes enough without that. It is as well that Claude Duval is out of date."

The two friends strolled late into Box A.

Many eyes were turned in Pimento's direction, for the diamond king was quite a celebrity.

"I like the Gaiety, it does not tax the intellect," said Lord Brackwell. "I can't stand a heavy drama after dinner—it is too indigestible."

"Will you come on with me to the club?" asked Ben, as the curtain fell, and he shrugged himself into his huge fur overcoat, for it was a bitter winter's night.

"Thanks, but I have promised to meet my wife at a ball, she wanted to leave early, so I think I shall go straight on."

As they came out into the vestibule Benjamin's footman, accompanied by another man servant, handed him a letter.

Mr. Pimento tore it open, seeing Foster's writing.

"DEAR BEN,—I am sending this to the theatre to catch you coming out. I must see you at once and alone. I have business with someone which will open your eyes. Come immediately. The bearer of this will bring you in my friend's carriage."

"I say, Brackwell," he exclaimed, "take my brougham, won't you? I have a very important affair to settle, and am going on in another conveyance, as I don't know how late I may be detained."

Then, turning to his own footman, he said:

"Tell them not to expect me at home. I am called away on an urgent matter."

"At it again," laughed Brackwell. "Always at fever-heat; burning the candle at both ends; business night and day. What a brain!"

"Good-night."

"Take care of yourself, Ben; you will crack up if you don't look out."

"Physically, then. I hope—not financially," and with these words Pimento was gone.

He followed the strange attendant to a carriage, the door being politely, though hurriedly opened, and he stepped in unobservantly, his head full of Foster's mysterious words:

"Something that would open his eyes!"

The carriage door was shut, and the vehicle rolled quickly away.

Ben threw himself back, and wondered what the nature of the business could be, for Forster was not in the habit of writing so peremptorily about anything.

So entirely engrossed was his mind since the receipt of the letter that he had not noticed the blinds of the brougham were drawn, and that he was in darkness. Suddenly awaking to the fact, he sat upright, and attempted to raise them, but, lo! and behold, his efforts proved fruitless. Much annoyed, he lit a match. Then a blinding, paralysing terror deadened his senses as he glanced round. No blinds, no windows, no door handles visible; only a padded prison of familiar shape.

He rose to his feet half in anger, but more in dread, and shouted vociferously for help. His voice seemed to re-echo like thunder round the walls, only to come back and choke him. The movement continued, the carriage sped on unchecked—no response. He yelled himself hoarse, he beat and kicked where the doors and windows should have been, flinging the whole weight of his body against them, merely to find them of unanswering iron.

Gradually the conviction broke over him, it dulled his nerves till he almost swooned, his pulses fluttered and stopped, he sank back on the seat numb, speechless, till gradually the throbbing life welled back into his veins. Here was he, a millionaire, trapped like a beast of prey in the heart of the City.

He stared with bloodshot eyes at the brougham. He was seated facing the horses in a tiny stronghold compartment. Escape was impossible; he turned giddy and faint again as he realised his position. Why was he there? What was the scheme? He had no money to speak of on his person; a watch and chain and half a dozen sovereigns; that would not pay for the coachman's livery. It was like some ghastly delusion.

The darkness closed over his soul, he longed for a ray of light in that harrowing hour of gloom. But there was not so much as a chink to relieve the blackness. He might have been hidden from sight in a vault down in the earth—underground, instead of passing through the brilliantly-lighted streets of the great Metropolis.

A moment since he had been watching the latest dance, hearing the last new song, in the very midst of life. Now, surely death itself had been preferable to the uncertainty, the maddening horror, of his weird captivity.

The fiercest resistance would have been perfectly fruitless; it was useless to struggle, to scream, to protest. There was no one to listen or heed. He waited in unspeakable perturbation for something to happen.

Presently the carriage stopped. His heart sank. Sounds as of screws being unturned reached his eager ears, while a tremor of apprehension shot through Pimento's trembling form. His utter helplessness appalled him.

The unscrewing ceased, for a moment all was still, then a slight shake and a drop, and he found his carriage moving at right angles, still evidently on wheels. Several yards appeared to be traversed quite smoothly, again a stoppage, and with it the momentary cessation of Pimento's heart.

Then, to his utter amazement, the door of the carriage flew open, and he sprang out to find himself in a handsomely-furnished room. He stood for a second staggered, bewildered; he brushed the cold sweat from his brow, and a sigh almost approaching relief escaped his lips.

Looking round dazed, but hopeful, the words which were almost too good to be true broke from him involuntarily:

"Some joke of Foster's!"

A joke! The silent walls seemed to repeat that unlikely assertion in ribald jeers. Was that suspicious box in which he was detained—a joke? Ah! foolish fancy, how easily you mislead the despondent mind, that longs to sooths its panic and dismay by even the thinnest fabrication!

He turned to inspect his large cage. It was just as he expected, an iron compartment, shaped like a very small brougham, and capable of being removed at will on to smaller wheels. By this means it had been run into the room, which was equally alarming, being utterly bereft of doors or windows. He looked eagerly for some way of escape, but, alas! there was none, absolutely no trace of any outlet whatsoever.

Purple velvet curtains from floor to ceiling covered only apparent windows. Benjamin grew gradually more awe-struck and perplexed. He felt every inch of the wall; he tried them with hands and boots, but no secret spring answered to his efforts.

At last, wearied by unsuccessful attempts, he drew Foster's letter from his pocket to ascertain if he had been deceived by a clever forgery. His eyes ran anxiously down the page, he scanned the letter, word for word, with wrinkled brow. Yes, sure enough, the handwriting was miraculously similar, but not Foster's genuine style. He could see that at last—the daring imitation, the audacious signature, copied to the life.

He ground his teeth, crushing the false message in his hands with a muttered imprecation. All doubt disappeared; the scales fell from his eyes, as he realised at last unmistakably that he was the victim of foul play. As yet the motive of this plot had to be revealed. It was all as strange and inexplicable as ever.

Suddenly he was roused from his unpleasant reflections by the silent lowering of an iron curtain, which descended from the ceiling in front of the carriage, shutting it out from the apartment.

"Was it going on its silent way to seek another unwary occupant?" The grim thought crossed Benjamin's distracted mind.

"Poor fellows!" he muttered compassionately. He began to wonder who his unseen foes could be—why they had brought him there with such reckless daring. Surely they never intended him to leave alive! Yet they could not obtain his money without his help, and he remembered no one who would wish to murder him from malice or revenge.

A few hot words, and in the far-off land many a stand-up fight and midnight adventure. But Ben could recall no enemies who thirsted for his blood or vowed to track him down and take his life; he had never done any especial harm. Since his return as a millionaire he had tried to make himself popular and beloved. His generosity became a proverb among his friends—"As lavish as Pimento," "As charitable as 'Ben.'"

Then why was he here in this lion's den? He stretched out his arms and called loudly on his tormentors:

"Where are you—what are you?—fiends—scoundrels. Come out and face me; say all that you have against me, and I will answer you as man to man. What! you dare not? There is nothing to fear in a weak, unarmed, defenceless prisoner. Surely you will tell me your intentions—give me some trial? Can't you explain this dastard's trick?"

Pimento was on his mettle at last, and determined to show a bold front.

His words, though they fell on dead walls, evidently reached some unseen ears.

A voice, which he could not locate, answered, addressing him by name—"Mr. Pimento."

He looked swiftly round. No sign, no form, only the words.

He waited impatiently.

"Yes," he cried fiercely; "I am here—Benjamin Pimento—continue."

His tone was one of lofty command, though his blood ran cold and his knees knocked together.

"You are in our power."

Bah! how well he knew it.

"Do what we bid you, obey implicitly, and all shall be well with you."

He started, and replied with fresh force and energy:

"What do you want? Is it money?"

Again the voice made answer:

"Sit at the writing-table, and commit to paper exactly what I tell you, word for word—no more, no less."

He turned, and saw at the far end of the room a large desk, on which were paper, envelopes, pen, ink. The thick nib that he always used was placed in readiness. Chance, he thought, as his eye fell upon it. He pulled forward a high-backed chair, and sank into it exhausted. The weight of his arm as he raised the pen felt like lead, his fingers seemed paralysed, with every movement he glanced furtively behind him.

He pulled the empty sheet towards him, and waited for the voice to speak again.

It came distinctly.

"Date your letter to-day, Monday night, nothing more, and commence:

"Dear Foss."

Pimento dropped his pen in surprise and disgust. It rolled across the paper, making a black smudge.

It was the familiar term of "Foss" that had startled him more even than all the unnatural events of the evening, this being the way in which his private and confidential letters to his partner were always addressed.

It was clear this diabolical scheme was the work of one "in the know."

"Write on," said the voice gruffly.

"I wish you had been at the theatre to-night," continued the dictator. "I have a splendid piece of business on. It will startle the City. Our consols and banks are not in it."

Again the pen rolled from his quivering grasp, this time upon the blotting paper.

Ben flung back his head, while great drops of perspiration stood out on his face.

"Need I mention them?" he groaned.

But the voice inexorably repeated: "Our consols and banks are not in it. Mr. Frank Moleyns will call upon you in the morning about eleven o'clock with a letter from me. Be prepared with £100,000 in cash for him. I shall not be able to accompany him, but will ring you up on the telephone at that time, and speak to you myself. Withdraw all assistance from the Stock Exchange to-morrow."

Benjamin Pimento leapt to his feet as if he had been struck, his eyes aflame with indignation, his breast swelling, his teeth clenched. He gasped for breath; when his words came they were choked with fury.

"I can't do it," he cried, livid with anger, resentment, dread. "The money is bad enough, but the other affects my honour. I have publicly stated that the market shall have my assistance, and not to do so would ruin my character in the City. They will put me down as a trickster."

A jeering laugh was the only reply from behind the wall.

"Write it."

He brought his fist down on the desk with a thud that resounded in the room.

"No," he hissed, and there was a ring of determination and deadly earnestness in the assertion.

There was silence. Ben sat staring at the paper without showing any inclination to proceed.

His mind was made up. Nothing should induce him to pen that scandalous sentence. He had risen step by step on to a pinnacle, his word was his bond, nothing should cast him down.

As he thus mused, he did not notice a rope fall over his head and tighten round his neck, each end passing through the opposite walls of the room. Seizing it with his hands, Benjamin endeavoured frantically to wrench himself free, but with no avail. So far he could breathe, but the unpleasant pressure on his throat warned him how easily that fleeting breath might be arrested.

The terrors of death compassed him about. He thought of the wife who loved him, the home in which she was the joy and sunshine. Could he give up all for the sake of his honour? It was a hard bill to pay.

"Thieves—villains—murderers!" he gasped, in a half-strangled whisper.

The voice said in its calm, calculating tones: "You are powerless to stop the tightening of this rope, write what you are told, and it will slacken. This is your last chance."

Life is dear, life above all things when death has laid his cold hand upon its victim. Benjamin Pimento was only mortal after all. Compliance being thus a sheer necessity, he wrote the fatal command:

"Withdraw all assistance from the Stock Exchange to-morrow.—Yours ever, Ben."

The voice continued:

"Address the envelope to your office, and place it on the bracket in front of you."

Reluctantly he obeyed. His head fell between his hands, he ground his teeth in agony and despair.

He stared through his fingers at that shameful epistle. The bracket revolved through the wall; his letter had gone beyond his reach—beyond control. Death or dishonour—dishonour or death! The words rang in his ears.

"It will be posted to-night," he thought, pacing with silent tread on the thick carpet. "What will Foster think? My writing, my orders! All that I have lived for—the position I have worked, fought, struggled to obtain—irretrievably lost! I shall be written down as a low-class speculator, who will stick at no meanness to affect markets!"

He paused in his steady march, for another movement attracted his attention—a table which revolved through the wall, and was spread with a most recherché supper, and a notice on it:

"Eat and drink, for to-morrow (if you behave yourself) you will not die. The couch in the corner will serve for your repose, which we trust will be undisturbed."

So those dare-devil desperadoes had not forgotten the courtesies of life; they would press their appetising fare on the unwilling guest, and lodge him in the luxurious apartment upon a bed of cushions and eiderdowns.

They had provided lavishly for his comfort, though he gazed on the elegant dishes disdainfully.

How could he eat? He turned from the table, revolted by the sight of food. But his throat was dry and sore, he fancied he still felt the rope on his windpipe, and, filling a glass of champagne, he drank it down feverishly, and another and another.

Then he fell wearily upon the lounge, overwrought by the miseries of the night, and tossed in mental torture till the day dawned, when his haggard eyes closed in the heavy, dreamless sleep of utter exhaustion.

When he awoke and a flood of thought rushed in upon his dazed senses, the wretchedness of his position returned tenfold. With another day fresh humiliations were forced upon him, and the cruel voice (when he had made a farce of breakfasting) ordered Benjamin Pimento once more to the desk.

"Remember," it repeated, "write every syllable, or your fate is sealed."

Again that objectionable forcing of their knowledge upon Ben.

"Dear Foss,—The bearer of this, Mr. Frank Moleyns, is the gentleman I wrote to you about last night. He will call about eleven, when I will ring you up on the telephone."

A last wild hope rose into his heart as he penned the words that from getting on to the telephone he might possibly be able to slip in a word of caution. At any rate it would show Foster who he was.

So he clung to this little grain of comfort till the voice informed him it was then eleven.

"You are required at the telephone," it solemnly announced.

Benjamin was startled from a reverie into which he had fallen, planning an impossible escape.

"Where is it?" he asked breathlessly.

As he turned to look, the wall at his right to about his own height and width receded, forming a niche in which he saw the mouth of the telephone.

Pimento walked up to it curiously, and stood in the niche, whereupon the rope again dropped over his neck, and the voice, now close to his ear, whispered:

"You must repeat my very words, no others. Any attempt to do so, and your speech will be silenced for ever."

The rope appeared to palpably tighten as if in warning.

"Do not think there is any chance of their discovering your hiding place by this telephone. We shall connect it with a wire over the house whose number is far from here."

In all his troubles Pimento could not but remark their forethought and cleverness.

"Remember," continued the voice, "we hear what is said to you, for we have a connecting wire, and your answers must be exactly what we whisper in your ear or you will never leave these walls."

The electric call bell rang, and the voice said loudly—

"Number 37,804."

Yes, that was his number.

Soon another ring of the bell announced the connection, while the familiar voice of one of his clerks asked—

"Are you there? Who are you?"

The hidden whisper said—

"Connect me with Mr. Foster."

Almost immediately his partner's tones saluted his ear.

"Hulloa! Is that you, Ben?"

The whisper answered "Yes."

"Yes," repeated Ben.

"Where are you?"

"Never mind," said the whisper. "Has Mr. Frank Moleyns called?"

"Yes, he is here now," came the reply.

"Can you recognise my voice?" continued the whisper, which Benjamin Pimento passed on.

"Perfectly," from Foster.

"Then give him that £100,000 at once in bank-notes."

"I have drawn it for him, and will hand it to him now."

The whisper said—

"When he has got it tell him to speak to me."

Almost immediately a totally strange voice addressed Pimento.

"I have got the £100,000 and will at once use it for the purpose arranged between us. Shall I explain the matter to Mr. Foster?"

The whisper answered—

"No; I will do so as soon as I can get into the City. You get off with it at once. Tell Mr. Foster to speak to me."

Foster's voice was again heard.

The whisper dictated—

"Send that fellow Moleyns off at once with the money, and don't keep him gossiping."

He could faintly hear Foster's farewell to Moleyns and the £100,000.

Again Foster's voice was at the telephone.

"I must speak to you about the other matter. You promised, as you know, to 'take in' any quantity of your Banks and Consols. Now that they find you are breaking faith with them, these stocks are falling heavily, and we are being roundly rated for our deceit. Pray withdraw now what you wrote me."

The rope tightened.

The whisper said—

"Tell them you won't do so."

As Benjamin hesitated the cords nearly choked him. He began gasping the words which at once loosened the cruel pressure.

"Tell them I shall not do so. Good-bye."

The connection was rung off, the rope withdrawn.

Pimento staggered back. What a villain all his friends whom he had told to buy the shares would think him. His character in the City would be ruined for life.

The voice resumed its former position, and told him to make himself comfortable for the day.

"Can't I leave now?" he moaned. "Are you not even yet satisfied?"

"Quite," replied the voice. "But we must have a quiet day without your interference, to turn the notes into gold and to allow sufficient fall for the shares."

Ben groaned. "Sufficient fall for the shares!"

He cared little for the £100,000 compared with his damaged financial honour.

The day dragged wearily by; at nightfall the revolving iron shutter gradually rose, and his carriage reappeared.

"Get in," said the voice, "and fear not for your safety."

He quickly complied, the door was shut, the wheels moved, and stopped. There was a lifting and a screwing, followed by the welcome rattle of wheels over stones. The drive seemed short, shorter than he had expected.

The carriage stopped, he eagerly waited for the lifting and screwing, but it did not come. He was evidently in some large thoroughfare. Still no movement of the carriage. What could it mean?

Feeling assured of the proximity of passers-by he determined to make one bid for his liberty.

With a yell and a bang on the door, which was immediately opened by someone passing, to his intense astonishment he jumped out.

At that instant a newspaper boy passing shouted—

"Evenin' paper! Great panic in the City!"

Where was he? The carriage stood still, the horse being held by a man at its head.

Pimento looked round, recognising the Café Royal, Regent Street, a short way off. Collecting himself in a moment, he sprang like a tiger at the man by the horse.

The passers-by, as well as the victim attacked, evidently took him for a lunatic, and called "Police!"

On a constable arriving, the horse-holder explained that he was employed in the public-house across the pavement, and the coachman had asked him to hold the horse while he had a drink, for which purpose he went inside, and had not yet come out.

Benjamin followed hastily, dashed inside, but found the man had drunk his glass of beer and left by an opposite door, leading into a side street, where all clue was lost.

The carriage and horse were taken to Scotland Yard, all that was left to Benjamin Pimento for his £100,000. But even these did not serve to disclose the plot, which remains a mystery to this day.

Ben's intimate friends believed the story as told, but the financial world looked upon it as ridiculous, and credited him with inventing it, as a cloak to cover his disgraceful means of getting back his shares cheap. The social public smiled and said: Cherchez la femme!

WHO WANTS A HUSBAND?

A Competition for Ladies Only.

The Editor of Pearson's Weekly has decided to offer his assistant, Mr. P. Doubleyou, as a prize to his lady readers. Mr. P. Doubleyou is tall and well-built, has regular features, fair hair and blue eyes, a broad, thoughtful brow, and looks the Briton to perfection.

Ladies between the ages of seventeen and seventy are eligible to compete. They must, however, be either spinsters or widows.

The fact of entering the competition does not in any way bind the successful competitor to marry Mr. P. Doubleyou if she doesn't like him after the meeting has taken place.

All expenses in connection with the marriage, including the bride's trousseau—which she will be allowed to choose herself—and white silk wedding dress, will be defrayed by Pearson's Weekly. Mr. P. Doubleyou will be granted a month's holiday for the honeymoon, of which all expenses will be paid.

Full particulars as to how you may win this prize will be found in the Whitsun Holiday Number of Pearson's Weekly, now on sale. Price twopence.

BIBLIOTHECA BODLEIANA

"Oh, come, mother, that's not fair, you have been gloating over that letter of yours with the most intense satisfaction depicted on every feature, and yet you are mean enough to keep the contents to yourself. I protest!"

"Hush, Joey," remonstrated the elder sister, "you should not be so flippant."

"Nonsense, Loo, you need not pretend to be so aggressively faultless, for you are just longing to know the contents of that letter, only you are such a fraud, you can go on placidly absorbing bacon and eggs, and toast and butter while curiosity devours you. Now I can't, that's just the difference between us!"

Mrs. Braxton and her daughters were sitting over the breakfast-table, while this light skirmish of words was going on between the two sisters.

Mrs. Braxton had very aristocratic tastes; when her first baby girl had made her appearance, the proud mother had insisted on giving her the high-sounding French name of Marie-Louise, to which she always religiously adhered despite its length, though many other people used the pet diminutive of Loo.

When, five years later, a second child was added to the nursery, nothing would content Mrs. Braxton but to call the new stranger Josephine.

Mr. Braxton mildly protested, then comforted himself by calling the child Joey. It had been a bitter disappointment to him not to have a son, and as the youthful Joey developed the most mischievous boy-like tendencies, he lured himself into the belief that she really was a boy. She was the companion of all his leisure hours, which unfortunately were few, as he was a busy city man.

Marie-Louise, who much resembled her mother, was the latter's favourite. Then came the sudden failure of Mr. Braxton's business in the city, through no fault of his, but through the culpability of his partner.

Mr. Braxton's health broke down under the harassing strain, both mental and physical, the doctors prescribed change of air. Mrs. Braxton proceeded to Mentone with her husband. Alas! all to no purpose, for hardly had they reached the South of France when Mr. Braxton died.

Nothing remained to the widow but to return to England and try to settle their affairs. Mrs. Braxton and her children had only a very small pittance left upon which to live, and they retired to a small place in Wiltshire.

Marie-Louise and her mother found it very hard to get reconciled to their life and surroundings at the Gable House, in this small, out-of-the-way village of Woodford. The society of the place was composed of the Rector and his family, the Doctor, and a few gentleman farmers.

It was now two years since they had been "buried alive in this hole," as Marie-Louise was wont contemptuously to style the Gable House, and the London-bred girl pined for some excitement, some change in their miserable, dull life, when a bright thought struck her. Why not advertise for a boarder? She at once submitted her idea to her mother.

"But, my dear child," the latter argued, "what girl would care to come and vegetate in our parts?"

"Girl! Mother, why, surely you did not suppose I meant a lady boarder; a gentleman, of course, is what we want, some nice man from London who needs relaxation, country air, and perhaps a little shooting. All these advantages he could get here, besides the society of cultured ladies."

"Child, child, how you do talk on! What about the risk of bringing you two girls into close contact with a strange man of whom I should naturally know next to nothing."

"Pooh, mother, you need have no fears on that subject. I am well able to look after myself, and as for Joey, why, no man will trouble his head about that awkward, romping school-girl, such a chit of a child."

"Well, but, Marie-Louise, how are we to get this boarder?"

"Oh, advertise, of course. Much as I hate this old place for its being so far from London, it is most picturesque with its projecting gables and lattice-windows, where ivy and roses, clematis and jessamine creep all over the premises. Most men coming from chambers in town would simply rave about the ideal poetry of the whole thing."

"In fact, for anyone but you, this is a very paradise of earthly bliss," said the mother smiling and coming round gradually as she always did to every suggestion of her favourite daughter.

"Of course it is, mother, and then just think of the inexhaustible fund we can draw upon to attract antiquarians and lovers of the relics of the past. Think of Stonehenge, Old Sarum, Salisbury Cathedral, all within, so to speak, a stone's throw of the Gable House."

So the matter was settled and the notice sent up to the Morning Post. When Joey heard of this, she vehemently protested.

"Oh, mother, Loo, how excruciatingly horrid to have a boarder, a strange man prowling about our place. We shall feel as if we must never talk about anything freely in the presence of this intruder!"

"You will certainly have to keep guard a little over your vocabulary of slang such as boys use in the public schools," sneered her sister.

Joey knew her protestations were not of the slightest use.

Several weeks passed and the advertisement remained unanswered.

"Well," burst out Joey, one Sunday evening, "it is the first time an earnest prayer of mine has been answered."

"What on earth does the child mean?" queried Mrs. Braxton.

"Oh, nothing, mother, only for several Sundays now I have inserted a clause in the Litany:

"'From a boarder or any other noxious reptile, Good Lord, deliver us!'"

"Josephine," severely exclaimed her sister, "you are profane, nay, almost blasphemous!"

And now, the letter Mrs. Braxton was so intent on reading, even to the neglecting of her fragrant morning beverage, was from a gentleman, asking to come and spend a month at the Gable House. Smiling, Mrs. Braxton at last laid the letter down:

"My dear girls, here is some promising and pleasant news."

"Oh, I know," groaned poor Joey, "it is from some horrible man who is coming to inflict himself upon us. I shall feel inclined to put crackers under his pillow or do something dreadful!"

"I hope a daughter of mine will always remember she is a lady!"

"Yes, mother, but it is so tame being a lady; now if I were a country wench, I could just do as I like."

"But, mother, do tell us," impatiently broke in Marie-Louise, "who is he? What does he say? When is he coming?"

"Gently, gently, my dear, I cannot answer a string of questions all at once. First of all, he is not quite a stranger and that quiets my scruples about his associating with you two girls——"

"Don't be afraid, mother dear, I shall not give him much of my society!"

"Don't be such a chatterbox, Joey, and let mother tell us all about him."

"Well, my notice in the Morning Post was seen by a former school friend of mine; she married long before I did, and we lost sight of each other, though we heard of each other's wedding; only our paths in life lay in different ways, and we never met. However, she is a widow now and has a son who is one of the rising doctors in London——"

"Oh, good gracious, a quack who will chase us round the house with physic-bottles and pill-boxes, it is even worse than I thought!"

"Josephine, be quiet at once. He is a rising young doctor, in fact his mother says he is one of the shining lights of science in the medical world. He is sadly in want of a change, wishes especially for peace and quiet, and his mother on seeing my name strongly urged him to try this out-of-the-way spot where he could have absolute rest.

"He is wonderfully clever and learned, deeply read, and Stonehenge and Old Sarum are helping to attract him here. We are to wire back 'yes' or 'no' if we can take him in to-morrow."

"Oh, goodness, I never thought the evil day was so close at hand!"

"Mother, this is too delightful and exciting. What is his name? Of course, he is unmarried?"

"Oh, Loo, surely you are not going to set your cap at a man who will pay us so much for his keep, who will come to our house as he would to a wayside hostelry!"

"Josephine, really your nonsensical remarks are too silly. Mother, do tell her she must in future be more careful with that glib tongue of hers."

"Oh, don't worry, Loo; I shall be mute enough when that wretched pill-giver is here."

"Mind, girls, I wish to impress on you that this gentleman is to be treated absolutely as a guest," Mrs. Braxton laid great stress on this word, "there is to be no question of his being a boarder, that would be most indelicate. You are to tell all our acquaintances in the village that we are expecting a guest. We must, of course, get the spare room ready at once and telegraph to Doctor Rocklin that we shall be quite ready for him to-morrow."

"Rocklin, mother, what a sweet name!"

"Yes, Gilbert Rocklin."

"I wonder if he is good-looking!"

"Oh, Loo, I shall sketch you his phiz in half a minute. Bald pate from overstudy and excess of brain development, blue specs. to show he is a 'savant,' slight stoop of the shoulders, resulting from constant poring over his books."

"A truce to your folly, Josephine; there are serious household matters to be discussed and carried out before our guest arrives."

The whole house was turned inside out the next day preparing for the stranger, whose advent was so distasteful to poor Joey. Mrs. Braxton donned her black Sunday silk and her most coquettish lace cap; as for Marie-Louise, she arrayed herself in a most becoming pale lavender frock, which "suited her style of beauty," she asserted.

Joey made no change in her everyday toilette. Disgusted with all the fuss made over the expected arrival of "the wretch!"

Standing beneath the tree, and gazing up at her, was a very good-looking young man.

as she mentally called him, she bent her steps into the orchard with a novel well tucked away into the bosom of her dress. She promised herself the delights of a whole afternoon's reading.

The orchard at the Gable House was quite an ideal spot; the trees were generally well-laden with fruit as each season came round, and the orchard sloped right down to the river Avon, which meandered along between its green banks perfumed by the exquisite fragrance of the tall meadow-sweet, which seems to grow here in greater profusion than in any other part of England.

This happened to be the month of June, the loveliest month, perhaps of any of the twelve; the whole of Nature seems to bloom and bud afresh, and we are not yet scorched by the burning rays of the July or August sun.

Joey made straight for the farthest end of the orchard; she stopped under the spreading branches of a veteran cherry-tree, whose gnarled trunk proclaimed its great age.

Nimbly as a young squirrel she climbed into the tree, and soon ensconced herself comfortably among the branches. She buried herself in her book and was soon lost to all else besides. She never realised exactly how long she had been up there, when some sort of mysterious instinct warned her she was no longer alone in the orchard.

Lifting her eyes from her book she looked down. To her horror she saw a man (in spite of her dismay she was quick to notice he was a very good-looking young man) standing right beneath her tree and gazing up at her with an amused twinkle in his handsome, honest, brown eyes.

Surely this gentleman who looked so aggressively youthful could not be the swell physician from London; but, then, who on earth could he be?

He was the first to break the embarrassing silence.

"What a cosy seat you seem to have up there!"

"Oh, the monster!" thought Joey, "to pass remarks on my position up here!" Still she tried, in spite of adverse circumstances, to be dignified, and she addressed him in a freezing tone:

"You have the advantage of me, sir, as I have not the honour of knowing who you are!"

"Well, yes, I suppose I am trespassing really, but I was not aware this was private property till I came unawares upon this tree, bearing such unexpected and charming fruit."

Joey blushed, and then felt angry with herself for being so idiotic. He pretended not to notice and calmly proceeded:

"I lost my way coming from the station, wandered along the banks of your river, which is a dream of beauty, and quite unintentionally, I assure you, stumbled into your orchard. I was seeking the Gable House."

"Oh! then you are really Dr. Rocklin?"

"Yes, certainly, very much at your service."

"Oh, no, thanks! I do not want your services at all!"

He laughed outright.

"Nay, don't alarm yourself, I shall not feel your pulse and prescribe for you against your will. Besides, the roses on your cheeks are evidences enough that you do not need my services."

Again Joey blushed, feeling wild with herself all the time for doing so.

"May I inquire how you know my name, when I am quite in the dark as to yours?" he queried.

"Of course I guessed who you are because this is the Gable House, only you have come in at the back instead of the front."

"Indeed!" And the young doctor seemed unnaturally elated at this piece of information.

"And so, you are Miss Braxton?"

"Oh, dear me, no! I am not Miss Braxton," and Joey laughed at the mere thought of being mistaken for her sister, "I am only Joey; my elder sister, Marie-Louise, is beautiful."

"And, Miss Joey, may I ask what she is, then?" and again she noticed the merry twinkle in his brown eyes.

"I? Ah, well, mother says I am an insignificant little schoolgirl!"

"Indeed! There is evidently some truth in the saying, 'one is never a prophet in one's own country.' So you are Miss Braxton Number Two, is that it?"

"Well, I suppose so, only no one ever calls me so—I am Joey, always Joey, to everyone!"

"I wonder if I might ask why they have presented you with our Colonial Secretary's Christian name. I never heard of a lady called Joey before!"

"Oh, that was my poor father's doing! You see he wished me to be a boy, and, failing that, he gave me a boy's name. My real name is Josephine."

"How very Napoleonic!"

"Yes, rather; I hate that pompous, French-sounding name—all those who love me call me Joey."

"Then I expect scores of people use that name."

She opened her large blue eyes to their widest extent. Was he unkindly making fun of her? No, he looked the very picture of innocence. She could not help thinking that, after all, his coming to the Gable House was not exactly the calamity she had dreaded. Only now she really wished he would betake himself to some other part of the premises; how on earth was she to descend from her tree if he would persist in remaining here? He seemed to read her thoughts, for he said abruptly:

"Won't you descend from your pedestal? I am at a disadvantage here, and you have to talk down to me!"

"Oh, please, Dr. Rocklin, would you mind going to the summer-house, just beyond those laurel-bushes, and fetching a basket so that we can gather some cherries?"

He gave her another of his quizzical looks from his merry brown eyes, and poor Joey was miserably conscious that he saw through her little device.

"Certainly, Miss Joey, if you pay me sufficiently high, I shall do your bidding."

"Pay you—how?"

"Well, bribe me, if you prefer it. Throw me down some of those cherries which are within your reach and out of mine."

Joey laughed, how boyish he seemed in spite of his learning and science. She plucked a large cherry, and, holding it between her finger and thumb, cried out merrily:

"Catch!"

"Shoot straight!" came the laughing retort, and he opened his mouth to receive the tempting morsel.

"Oh, for shame, Miss Joey, you aimed at my nose—I know you did! Let's try again."

And again and again Joey pelted him with cherries, which he sometimes ate, sometimes threw back at her. They both thoroughly enjoyed their little game, and were as elated as a couple of school-children out for a holiday.

At last Joey exclaimed:

"Haven't I bribed you enough? Do go for that basket!"

"Are you tired of our nice little game?" and he looked up at her half reproachfully.

"Oh, no, but—" she faltered in an embarrassed way.

"Yes, I see—quite so; you are weary of your exalted position," and, with a mischievous backward look, he strode off in the direction of the summer-house.

She did not lose much time in scrambling down from her tree, and when he returned she was busy picking up the fallen cherries, looking as demure as possible.

"Now, Miss Joey, if you had only asked me to help you down this would not have happened," and with his stick he pointed to a huge rent in her frock.

"Nor this!" and again his stick pointed, but this time it was her hair to which looked perilously near to falling, pins and hair seemed ready to part company for good.

She hastily put up her hand to prop up the falling structure, but too late, and in billowy waves of soft auburn silk, her beautiful hair fell over her shoulders, to her utter confusion.

"Shall I go for another basket?" he gravely asked.

"Oh, Dr. Rocklin, you are simply horrid—go away!" and helplessly she tried to stick in a rebellious pin here and there.

"Am I really horrid? You mean what you say, Miss Joey?"

"Yes, certainly, before you came I never called you anything, but the wretch! and I think I shall stick to it even now."

"Indeed! Why call me names before ever you laid eyes on me?"

"Oh, because I hated the idea of your coming here at all; I thought that your presence here would spoil all my pleasant home life."

"Well, in that case, I had better take the next train back to London if my presence is so distasteful to you."

"I said before you came," Joey murmured. "You see," she went on, "I had always associated doctors with pill-taking, and as pills are always nasty——"

"Well, and now that you know me, do you still associate me with pills, nasty pills?"

"No," and she looked up at him merrily from under her long lashes, "I shall always associate you now with—cherries!"

"Ah, thank you, that's better! What book was that you were reading?" and he picked it up from the long grass where it had fallen when he had startled her by his unexpected appearance.

"'A Heart of Stone,' good gracious! how can your mother let you read such a book?"

"Mother never interferes with what I read."

"This is a highly improper book for a child like you to be reading."

"But I am not a child!" Joey indignantly protested.

"You know I am leaving here the day after to-morrow?" he asked abruptly.

"Very well, then, it is not the right sort of book for a young lady of your mature years."

"But, why not? It is so amusing. I have only just read the opening chapters, but it bids fair to be a delightful novel."

"Ah! you have only just begun it?"

"Yes," and she held out her hand for the book; "please give it back."

But with a quick movement he eluded her grasp and flung the offending volume right into the river Avon.

"Oh! how wicked of you! and it belongs to the Lending Library, too!"

"Never mind, I shall settle for it. Far better it should float down the Avon than poison the mind of a pure, innocent girl."

"I do not see what right you have to interfere with my reading," and she still looked at him with indignant eyes.

"No right at all, Miss Joey," he said gently, "except the righteous indignation of anyone who sees a noxious reptile ready to contaminate by its touch the fairest flower of a garden. Won't you forgive me?"

Joey was mollified by his pleading tones, and by the pretty compliments.

"Well, yes, I suppose I must forgive you. And, Dr. Rocklin, please, I want to ask you something," she said hesitatingly.

"Professionally?" he laughed, as he saw her move hastily back a few paces from him.

"No, of course not professionally. But, would you mind not telling mother and Marie-Louise how—I mean—where you found me in the orchard, because——"

"Yes, of course, I can quite understand. Your people do not approve of these bird-like flights of yours!"

"Dr. Rocklin, please, be generous. I may trust you not to betray me? You will say nothing?"

"Certainly!" and he felt elated at the mere thought of sharing this secret with her; it would make a bond of union between them.

They had by this time reached the lawn in front of the drawing-room windows, where Mrs. Braxton and Marie-Louise waited in state to receive their guest. To their amazement they now saw Joey calmly walking side by side and pleasantly chatting with the tall stranger who must be Doctor Rocklin.

As they neared the glass door opening out into the garden Joey hastily bid her new friend good-bye for the present.

"Please excuse me, Dr. Rocklin, but if mother sees me with my untidy hair I shall catch it."

The young man entered the room alone. Both ladies came forward eagerly to greet him. He made profuse apologies for his unofficial arrival by the back premises.

"But the fact is I lost my way, and wandered into your orchard without even knowing that I had reached the Gable House. There I had the good fortune to meet your daughter."

"Ah, yes, Josephine! She is such a child, you must have found her schoolgirl chatter very wearisome."

"No, indeed, I found Miss Joey's unsophisticated ways so fresh and delightful."

"Why, dear me, she is barely out of the schoolroom!"

Still, Dr. Rocklin perversely kept his eyes fixed on the door, and seemed but an indifferent listener to his two hostesses, who were, nevertheless, doing their level best to entertain him.

At last the door slid gently open, and Joey glided in; she had donned a white muslin frock, and had smoothed back her hair. He rose at once and courteously advanced a chair for her.

She glanced up at him gratefully, she was so unaccustomed to these attentions; no one ever seemed to pay heed to her. After tea, Dr. Rocklin was shown to his room, and then Marie-Louise was free to pour the vials of her wrath on her luckless younger sister.

* * * * *

Happy days now dawned for Joey, Dr. Rocklin sought her society on every possible pretext, it was continually—

"Miss Joey, would you mind taking me to Stonehenge?" "Could you spare the time to accompany me to Old Sarum?" "Would it be importuning you to ask you to take me on the river this afternoon?" and so on.

Marie-Louise levelled veiled sarcasms and biting sneers at her younger sister, but the young people were far too much absorbed in each other's society to pay much heed to her spiteful allusions.

His month's stay was quickly drawing to a close, and still he had not spoken to her, a sort of nervous dread held him back. "Suppose," he thought, "she does not reciprocate my love, and that in speaking out to her I lose her for ever!" True love is diffident, and tortures itself with these agonising perplexities as to the reciprocity of our love.

At last he felt he must speak; it was within two days of his leaving for London. They had wandered out immediately after supper at Gilbert Rocklin's wish, to gaze on Stonehenge by moonlight. It was indeed a grand sight to behold the silver orb shedding its glimmering radiance on these massive, century-old columns, the impenetrable mystery of which no human being can fathom.

Gilbert and Joey seated themselves on a fallen pillar, and discussed the ancient Druids, and how on this very stone altar, which still partly subsists, human victims had been slain to appease the wrath of the cruel deities who demanded that blood should flow to prove the zeal of their worshippers.

Suddenly Gilbert stopped talking, she looked up at him inquiringly.

"You know I am leaving the day after to-morrow?" he asked abruptly.

A swift look of pain shot across her face, but her innate womanly reserve was quick to warn her she must not show him how much she dreaded the approaching parting, and so she averted her face. He noticed the movement, did not guess the reason, and he sighed.

"I suppose my staying or going is of little import to you?"

Still she did not answer nor turn her face towards him.

"Well, Miss Joey, thanks to your pleasant companionship, my stay here has been a very happy one, a sort of bright oasis in my life which is like an arid desert of science and work."

"I have been happy, too, Dr. Rocklin, thanks to you," at last she ventured timidly to say. These few words seemed to give him sudden and desperate courage.

"I can't help it, Joey; don't be angry with me. I must speak out before I go. I know it is no use, but I love you."

She did not look at him even then, but softly on the night breeze were borne to him the astounding words—

"So do I!"

Quick as a flash of lightning he possessed himself of her hand.

"Well, you ought to be ashamed of yourself for not letting me know of this before!"

She looked at him demurely, and then a mischievous smile lit up her features.

"Not very likely I should! I was not aware that ladies proposed to gentlemen, except in leap year."

"But, Joey I have loved you from the very first moment I set eyes on you in the cherry-tree!"

"How strange, because I think I—well, I certainly liked you from the time I pelted you with cherries!"

"And I never suspected it!"

"Ah!" and she smiled with a superior air, "that's because until now you have addicted yourself far more to science than to love!"

"Well, I like the latter infinitely better than the former!"

"Do you really! Well, I must confess I appreciate cherries far more than pills!"

"Joey!"

"Yes?"

"I want to kiss you!"

"Oh, what a thing to suggest! Why, it would be profane to do so in these holy precincts. The souls of the Druids and of their slaughtered victims would rise from their long rest to anathematize us!"

But, in spite of her laughing protest Gilbert had his arm round her, and, drawing her towards him, imprinted a kiss on her unresisting lips.

And so, amidst the hoary vestiges of the Celtic religion, was enacted the old, old story which repeats itself over and over again through the passing centuries.

Lily Butler.

"There is always a way out of a scrape." "What's that?" "Letting your whiskers grow."

Baulso: "How did you manage to get through the crowd? I had to wait for an hour." Cumso: "I was smoking that cigar you gave me."

Lady: "Yes, Mr. Brown, I think poor pussy has had a stroke of apoplexy." Mr. Brown, M.R.C.V.S.: "M—m, I think not; looks more like a stroke of boot-jack."

"Did you know," said the man who was reading an article about the contraction of metals, "that a clock ticks faster in winter than summer?" "No, I never noticed that about a clock. But I know a gas-meter does."

"I want to look at some canes," said a magnificent young man to the shopman, "and I am in a hurry." "Yessir, yessir," responded the shopman, very much flusterted. "Here, James, show the gentleman some hurricanes."

An absent-minded man once received a letter. He knew the handwriting; he wanted to read it in haste. It was very dark, so he struck a light, tore a piece of paper, and lighted a candle. But the letter was gone—he had used it to light the candle.

C.: "I suppose Brown and his wife attracted the attention that newly-married couples usually do?" B.: "Oh, no! Brown married a widow, you know, and to avoid being suspected of being on a honeymoon trip she took one of her children with them."

Mrs. Dorcas: "I do think the Ladies' Spare Time is the best magazine I ever saw. In the current number it shows you how to make a lovely pair of slippers out of an old flannel shirt." Mrs. Newed: "But wouldn't that be difficult?" Mrs. Dorcas: "Not at all. If you make them too large you have only to soak them in water till they shrink to the proper size."

BRAND NEW COMPETITION.

Cash Down. Cash Down. Cash Down.

1st Prize, £50. 2nd Prize, £25. 3rd Prize, £10.

And 25 Gramophones.

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Below will be found six paragraphs containing the buried names of Railway Stations in the United Kingdom (or words that sound the same as the names). You must write in the spaces given the names of the Railway Stations so indicated.

No word or part of a word may be used more than once in making up the name of a Railway Station. In the event of the name of a Railway Station occurring more than once in a sentence, it should be underlined and written down each time. In case of more than one person finding the same number of words for each or any sentence, those words containing the largest number of letters will have preference. No name of a Railway Station may be composed of a single letter, either standing by itself or taken from any word in the sentences.

When you have discovered the names of Railway Stations in the sentences, underline (in ink) the words which go to make up the names (or words that sound the same as the names) and then on the line underneath each sentence write (in ink) the correct names of the Railway Stations to be found in each.

All the names will be found in the Index to Railway Stations in the January edition of Bradshaw's Guide. Should you be unable to obtain a copy of this Guide, a reprint of the Index will be sent to you for three penny stamps on application to Bradshaw's Guide, 59 Fleet Street, London, E.C.; or Room Eight, SHORT STORIES, 17 and 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

The names of the Railway Stations consist of one word or two or more consecutive words, or consecutive parts of one word, or two or more consecutive words.

The first prize of £50 will be given to the Competitor who fills in the greatest number of railway stations under the conditions stated. The second prize of £25 will go to the person who fills in the next greatest number, and the other prizes will be awarded in the order of merit.

When you have filled in all the names you can find, cut out the list below and keep it by you. Don't on any account send it to us until the closing date is announced in SHORT STORIES. The last list of sentences will appear next week.

In the event of a tie a further list (or, if necessary, several further lists) of sentences will be submitted to the tieing competitors until one wins the first prize outright.

The oaks were swaying in the breeze, the cows were grazing peacefully, when out of the park tore a huge black bull.

The Oaks, Sway, Cowes, Grays, Park, Black Bull.

ELEVENTH LIST.

61. Your bay horse shows great promise, you'll surely win several prizes with him.

62. The whole prairie was covered with a bushy growth of small thorn and prickly pear trees, so that it was not easy to travel over it.

63. They patched up that old leak in the waste pipe; it had been a good deal of trouble, letting water fall through to the rooms below several times.

64. On our last cycle ride we did a record up and down hill, without having a spill. We were not long over it, either.

65. Don't stand on that bridge, it is likely to give way, the hurry and rush all day of trains have loosened the supports.

66. The Great North Road is one of the finest out of London. It runs through bigger cities than other main roads do.

He Matched the Dog.

"How could Penelope marry that bowlegged man?" "She doesn't mind it, he matches her dachshund."

How Should He Know?

He: "I wouldn't cry, dear." She: "You don't kno what you would do if you had a new five-shilling handkerchief."

No Encouragement.

"What's worrying you, Harry dear?" "I'm afraid I'm not worthy of you, sweetheart." "Oh, well, keep on worrying."

He Put It Kindly.

Molly: "What did he mean by telling me I was as bright as the morning?" Dolly: "I suppose, dear, he meant—you were as plain as daylight."

It Was Much Brighter.

Rev. Dr. Thumper: "Does not married life seem brighter to you?" Mrs. Newbride: "Yes, rather. Our wedding presents included twenty-five lamps."

Papa's "Summary" Manner.

"You must not be discouraged, George," she said. "Papa may be abrupt, but his heart is as warm as a June day." "Yes," replied George, "I've noticed that his manner is very summary."

Evils Never Come Singly.

Mr. Bing: "It's remarkable, Miss Smith, how, when I follow you out of the ballroom, all the other men tag after us." Miss Smith: "Well, you know the old proverb—that evils never come singly."

How Theatres Should Be Arranged.

She: "Theatres ought to be arranged with the women all on one side, and the men on the other." He: "Why?" She: "So that when men go out between the acts they can tramp on each other's toes."

Had Seen it Before.

The Marquis (at the swellest ball in London): "Surely I have seen your beautiful face before, Miss Saintlou Cureall?" Miss Saintlou Cureall: "Mor'n likely. Pa used it on all his patent medicine ads., as 'After taking.'"

Feminine Amenities.

Clara: "I understand that Mr. Featherley paid me a very pretty compliment to-day?" Ethel: "Yes; what was it?" Clara: "He said that among the most beautiful young ladies at the party was Miss Clara Smith." Ethel (with a cough): "Yes, I noticed you among them."

Like Her Sister.

The addresses of a young man having been declined by a young lady, he paid court to her sister. "How much you resemble your sister," said he the evening of his first call. "You have the same hair, the same forehead, and the same eyes——" "And the same noes!" she added quickly.

Announcing the Engagement.

"How did Eleanor announce her engagement to the family?" "She just wiggled the finger that had on the diamond ring."

Still a Woman.

"So you discovered that female burglar in your house?" "Of course; she stepped on a baby's rubber doll, and thought it was a mouse."

Hadn't Far to Go.

Gerald: "If you don't marry me I shall go to the dogs." Geraldine: "You won't have to go far. There's one waiting for you at the gate."

How He'd Make a Name.

Jones: "I think your boy will become a very distinguished man if he lives long enough." "Yes? What do you think he will be distinguished for?" "Longevity—if he lives long enough."

A Fortune in his Grasp.

"Would you believe," said a thriftless young man to a friend, "that I had a fortune in my grasp last evening!" "How so?" asked the friend. "I shook hands with a girl whose fingers were covered with diamonds."

To Help the Sailors!

Mrs. Unsofist: "They say that the Terrible can steam twenty knots in an hour." Mr. Unsofist: "That's what she can do." Mrs. Unsofist: "I suppose they steam them so that the poor sailors can untie them more easily."

That Accounted for It.

Agent: "I think I can sell this place for you, but I can't get the £5,000 you ask. You'll have to take £4,998." Owner: "That's queer. Why should the extra £2 stand in the way?" Agent: "My customer is a woman."

Resigned to Fate.

"Come back!" Her cry smote the empty air and was lost. "Perhaps——" She bowed to the decree of Fate. "——it is better thus." Upon closer inspection she discovered that the umbrella he left was silk and not alpaca, after all.

His Chance.

Ethel: "They say that when De Broke proposed to Carrie, she tossed up a coin to decide whether or not she would accept him." Maud: "And the coin said no?" Ethel: "She never knew. Lord De Broke caught the coin when it was in the air, and rushed out with it."

He Wasn't Very Heartbroken.

A loveloRn swain, after conversing a while with the object of his affection on the interesting topic of matrimony, concluded at last with the emphatic question: "Will you have me?" "I am sorry to disappoint you," replied the lady, "and hope my refusal will not give pain; but I must answer 'no.'" "Well, well, that will do," said the philosophical lover; "and now suppose we change the subject."

Only His Bicycle Tyre.

She: "For the last four miles back I have been hearing soft, weird, far-away music. I wonder what it can be?" He: "It's my tyre leaking. It got flat before I started, and there was no pump to be had, so I got a blind accordion player to hitch it to his instrument with an old gas stove tube. He played 'Home, Sweet Home,' with variations, in it four times before it got hard. Now it's oozing out."

Plenty of Squeezing Then.

"Now, Algernon," said Miss Fussanfeather, as she was tightly held in the embrace of her fiancé, "they tell me that men get tired of squeezing after they are married. Will you promise me not to give it up after we are man and wife?" "Oh, I assure you it is not necessary to make any such promises," replied the young man. "I guarantee you'll have all the squeezing you want to do to get along on thirty shillings a week."

The Affair at No. 24.

How a Family Quarrel Nearly Ended in a Tragedy.

THE family affair at No. 24 Bracewell Terrace might be now described as a comedy-drama, although it approached the domain of tragedy at one period of its development.

The details of the affair, and how it tested the love of Horace Maxwell for Violet Harrison, did not become public property all at once; the facts leaked out one day one by one and only recently have the occupants of the other villas in the Terrace fully understood what happened. Their enjoyment of details is, however, marred by the fact that the house has had a change of tenants in the meanwhile.

The position at No. 24 at the beginning of the affair was, it seems, well known to some of the residents in Bracewell Terrace, and the following conversation, carried on at No. 23 (which was exactly opposite), states it accurately.

"It may work well but I doubt it," remarked Mrs. Clarke to her friend from No. 11. "I remember a case like it, and there was trouble over that. So there will be here, you mark my words."

"I don't think that I properly understand it," rejoined Mrs. Thomas, a meek creature entirely under the influence of Mrs. Clarke.

"Oh, it's very simple," asserted the latter. She was quizzically dubbed "the detective of the street" by certain other residents. "This is how it stands:

"Mrs. Baynes, at No. 24, has a brother; his name is Horace Maxwell and he is between three and four years younger than she. He fell in love with a Miss Violet Harrison, whose father was reputed to be very well-to-do, brought his daughter up like a lady, and thought that Maxwell was not good enough for her. Maxwell made up his mind to get on in his profession and Violet was willing to wait.

"Then old Harrison died, and it turned out that Violet would have to earn her own living. Maxwell would have married her there and then, but it was hardly the correct thing to marry immediately on the death of her father.

"Maxwell would not let her go out as a governess or in any other capacity, so it was arranged—chiefly by him and Mr. Baynes, his brother-in law, that Violet should live with the Baynes. She could help in the housework and gain an insight into household management, of which she has very little knowledge, I assure you.

"That seems a very good idea on the surface, but the fact is"—here Mrs. Clarke assumed a confidential air and tone—"Mrs. Baynes does not think so much of Miss Harrison as her brother does and is cross because he did not bestow his attentions on another young lady, a friend of hers."

"I see," said Mrs. Thomas reflectively. "That means trouble, very likely. Yet Mrs. Baynes ought to be glad, for her baby must occupy a great deal of her attention—young babies always do!—and it should be a comfort to her to have someone there to look after the house. I don't think much of the servant they've got, and my girl tells me that the girl at 24 won't stop."

"My opinion of Miss Harrison, from the glimpse I caught of her, is that she wouldn't mind performing any duty and would take up the servant's work if the Baynes should be without a maid for a time, which is likely enough if their girl leaves. But if Mrs. Baynes has taken any sort of a dislike to her, of course, trouble is sure to arise!"

There was one point which Mrs. Clarke forgot or did not know; that was that Mr. Horace Maxwell would be compelled by circumstances of his profession to undertake trips to South Africa two or three times during the ensuing year and was to bid farewell to his sweetheart within a week, prior to starting on the first journey.

Violet Harrison had been in the house of her prospective relatives for nearly a fortnight when the above-mentioned conversation took place.

She had welcomed the suggestion when first made and she had entered the Baynes' household with the firm belief that she would be as happy there as it was possible for her to be anywhere, but during the last two days she had begun to have misgivings. She could not quite comprehend the attitude of Horace's sister; it puzzled and slightly worried her.

The sisterly sympathy which she had expected from Alice Baynes was not forthcoming to the anticipated extent; something in Alice's manner jarred upon Violet's sensitive feelings, yet it would have been very difficult for her to have defined her complaint against Alice.

"It is all my fancy, I expect," murmured poor Violet, trying to be cheerful even while her heart was heavy. "I won't say anything to Horace; that would look like ingratitude; but I wish he were not going away!"

Violet Harrison was a pretty girl and had a gentle disposition; she was the kind of girl who would make a perfect helpmeet for a strong man—she would comfort him, encourage him, and make him good; his home would be a place of happiness; but she herself was not fitted to do rough battles with less sensitive natures, and she wanted the strong arm of a man to shield her. Viewed from this standpoint, there could have been no better match than Horace and Violet.

"I shall be away about two months, dearest!" said Horace Maxwell, as he said "Good-bye" to Violet on the day before his departure. "I am thankful that you are under this roof, and I shall be more thankful when I can conduct you to our own house! My sister is one of the kindest women you could find ; my brother-in-law is a good fellow ; so you will be all right."

"I shall do my best to repay them for their kindness, Horace," said Violet simply, keeping back the tears with an effort. "Take care of yourself and come back soon—for my sake !"

Horace's answer need not be recorded ; let it be a secret between two loving hearts ! On the next day he left for Africa and Violet strove to banish all dismal thoughts and to believe that she was misjudging Alice.

Tom Baynes—good-hearted, easy-going fellow !—felt exceedingly comfortable for the next week ; things were going fairly well in his household, which had not been the case since the advent of the baby, and he was glad that Violet was there to help. He quite enjoyed himself in the evening and wondered why his energetic wife was not more contented than she appeared to be.

"It makes things easier for you, eh ?" he queried one evening when they were alone. "I am glad of that ! The baby worried you and the household worried you, and now—"

"And now it looks as if it would not be any better !" interposed Alice rather sharply.

She did not altogether appreciate the suggestion that she was having an easier time ; she liked to be regarded as an over-worked, over-worried woman, and she was losing this consolation.

"The girl has given notice, I am certain to be left alone for a time, as girls are so scarce, and Violet isn't much good. You see, she has never been trained in housework and—what are you laughing at ? I can tell you that housework cannot be performed properly unless you have been trained to it. My mother trained me !"

"Oh, we shall get over it !" said Tom cheerfully, anxious to change the subject. "I am sure that Violet will help, and you must wink at a few things ! Isn't she a quiet, inoffensive kind of girl ?"

Tom Baynes was beginning to wish that some of Violet's inoffensiveness could be transferred to his wife and some of her aggressiveness infused into Violet, just to equalise matters.

"She has a temper hidden away for use on occasions !" snapped Alice. "You may be sure of that !"

Things went on more or less satisfactorily till the general servant left, and then the baby was taken with some infantile ailment and the course of domestic economy did not run smooth. Violet had to do most of the household management, while Alice looked after the child and varied the monotony by grumbling at Violet's doings.

The baby's illness did not make Alice any better disposed towards her future sister-in-law. Irritated by the trouble, she vented her vexation and worry as a sort of safety valve on Violet. To do her justice, she did not comprehend the extent of her actions ; it was a case of want of thought quite as much as want of heart, but the results were the same.

The crisis was reached when Tom arrived home one evening and found Alice in the wildest excitement. The baby had been taken worse and the doctor had given his opinion to the effect that some kind of irritant poison had been imbibed by the little one. A trifling quantity of noxious fluid, or an apparently insignificant amount of powder mixed with its food, would be sufficient to do the mischief where so young a child was concerned.

"But the worst remains to be told," said Alice desperately. "Who gave the poisonous stuff to the little cherub ? Why, Violet !"

"Nonsense !" was all that Tom could gasp, so overwhelmed was he by this intelligence.

"I wish it was nonsense !" cried Alice in tears. "It is true enough ! I went into the kitchen after the doctor was gone, to tell her. She prepares the food. Of course, the doctor thinks that the irritant was in the food when bought, and I did not dare to undeceive him, for the credit of the family !

"Well, Violet was out in the garden. On the table stood some milk—just a drop that was left, and it tasted dreadful, almost enough to choke you. The smell was bad, too, but not the smell of ordinary sour milk. No ! I am convinced that something has been done !"

Tom Baynes looked grave ; the matter was assuming a serious aspect.

"Before we say anything, Alice, we must make inquiries !" he declared.

"I have already made inquiries !" said Mrs. Baynes decisively. "I called Mrs. Amer in to look after the baby and I went to the chemist. I remember that Violet went to the chemist last night, ostensibly to buy something for her headache, and I wanted to know what she bought.

"The chemist told me that he did not see the features of the girl very well, as he was shutting up and all his lights were out save one, and he didn't take particular notice, but he thought my description of Violet tallied. Naturally, I didn't say it was Violet to him !

"Well, she bought some poisonous stuff he sells for beetles and such like. I asked no more questions ; a small dose of that stuff, a grain or two, would be sufficient. Tom, that girl is bad, thoroughly bad ! I never trust such quiet, innocent people !' What are we to do with her ?"

"I'll have her in and question her, and if she cannot give a good account of herself, she must go !"

Tom Baynes' face became severe ; an attempt to injure a baby was a crime that merited heavy punishment.

"Violet, my wife has told you what the doctor said. You prepared the food. Have you any explanation to offer ?" inquired Tom, in coldly judicial tones.

Violet looked at him without comprehending. She turned her eyes to Alice and then back to Tom, and her lips parted as if to speak, evidently to ask what was meant. A sudden change came over her features as the force of the questions struck her ; she raised her hands as if to ward off a blow and cried :

"Oh, no, no ! Surely you do not think I did it ! Surely you do not wish to say that I wished to hurt the dear little thing !"

To an outsider, the ring of sincerity would have been recognised and her innocence practically established, but the parents were too interested to judge properly.

Alice was convinced ; Tom was exceedingly sorry that Violet should be implicated, but he felt that she had been animated by some motive, some feeling, which he could not understand, and his next utterance was more severe than the preceding.

"There are certain facts which require explanation," he went on, "and you should be able to explain them easily if there is nothing in them." He repeated what his wife had told him about the milk and the visit to the chemist.

"On your own statement," he continued, "the milk was perfectly good when you had it, yet there is no question that something had been done to it in the short space of time it was in this house. You bought beetle poison ?"

"I did not buy anything !" declared Violet with a sob. "I went out for the purpose, I know, but I thought the shop was shut, so I walked about for a minute or two and came back ! I did not do anything so wicked as to tamper with the baby's food ; why should I ?"

"I can't answer that question !" said Tom mournfully.

"It is all deceit !" cried Alice. "You have done wrong and now you must try to make out a good case for yourself ! The chemist is prepared to swear it was you, and the milk shall be analysed ! You will leave this house to-morrow !"

"You cannot charge me with acting so basely !" cried Violet, aroused now by the gravity of the charge. "There is no motive for me to act so, when you have been so good as to let me stay here. I will demand a proper investigation ! You shall not brand me as a criminal like this !"

She stood before them with flashing eyes and clenched hands. The trace of moisture in the lustrous eyes gave added power to their expression and the colour that suffused her cheeks made her look prettier than ever.

"It is wicked of you to condemn me like this !" she continued. "Oh, if Horace were here !"

After that outburst she broke down and sobbed. Tom whispered to his wife ;

"It looks black against her," he said, "but it isn't absolutely proved, and Horace will think that we might have sifted the matter thoroughly before accusing her. Better let her keep in her own room till we have investigated matters. She insists on an investigation, so if we send her away, we shall only make the affair public. Keep her here and sift the whole thing more privately!"

He carried his point and Violet accepted the arrangement; she was determined not to rest under a cloud if she could do anything to clear herself.

The milk was submitted for analysis; the preliminary report was that there was undoubtedly some noxious chemical in it, but a proper examination would be necessary to prove what it was.

The position was decidedly awkward; Violet feigned illness and kept her room, and Alice managed to engage the services of a charwoman. Such a condition of affairs, however, was intolerable, and there is no telling what would have happened if Horace had not arrived unexpectedly, nearly a fortnight before the appointed time.

"I kept you in ignorance in order to surprise you all!" he cried in high glee. "What's the matter? Where is Violet? Is there anything wrong with her, Alice? Tell me, quick!"

Alice led him into the best room and told the whole story as coherently as she could, ending with: "The baby is getting over it!"

"Attempt to poison the baby—fiddlesticks! You are mad, both you and Tom!" cried Horace angrily. "I don't care if the evidence is as black as night," he added, as his sister interposed a remark about the weight of evidence. "I won't believe it!"

In spite of his outburst, Horace was painfully impressed; despite his unwillingness to believe the evidence, he was forced to admit, to himself, that the whole matter had an ugly appearance. Yet, Violet was incapable of it!

"Let me go into the kitchen and see for myself," he said. "Some whitewash fell off the ceiling or something natural happened!"

At that moment Tom came home and, after a few words, Horace went to the kitchen, followed by husband and wife.

"There!" said Alice, pointing to a cup on the table. "There stands a cup with some milk, just as it was then. This cup is in the same position as that one was! Now——"

She began to cough, as did Tom and Horace.

"That stupid woman has pulled the damper out, and the coke fumes are coming into the kitchen!" said Tom angrily.

"Violet made that mistake once or twice," said Alice. "Coke burns well in that grate if you manipulate the dampers, and it isn't nearly so expensive as burning coals there."

Horace was looking at the grate meditatively. Then he went to the cup of milk, as an idea struck him, and sipped it.

"Taste that!" he cried. "Isn't that the same poison as you found in the other?"

"Yes!" returned Alice, looking at his searching eyes with a chill at her heart.

"Yes," said Horace bitterly. "You were so positive that you almost made me doubt the sweet girl's innocence! It's all as easy to explain as A. B. C.! The fumes of the coke have spread about the room and have impregnated the milk. Milk will take up vapours and infection more quickly than anything, and, of course, there is enough poison in those fumes to upset a child who took that milk made up into food!"

"Where is Violet?" was Horace's next remark.

He strode from the kitchen in time to catch her as she ran down the stairs, slipping in her eagerness to get to him as soon as she caught the sound of his voice.

It will be well to draw a veil over the two scenes—the happiness and reunion of two lovers, and the spectacle of Mr. and Mrs. Baynes making their apologies.

It was fortunate that Violet was a sweet, forgiving girl and that Horace was too pleased at the prospect of not having to go away on any more trips to South Africa.

The family affair had taught Alice a lesson; she insisted on Violet remaining with them that she might atone for her harshness, and she did her utmost for the girl till the time came for Horace to claim her as his bride. F. Brewster.

MOSELEYS FOOD

"MADE IN A MINUTE."

Moseleys Food is scientifically prepared in vacuo from selected cereals by a new process during which the starch is converted into a readily digestible and soluble product.

It possesses remarkable recuperative properties most fully demonstrated when there is difficulty in administering or retaining nourishment.

Preventing constipation without causing diarrhœa, Moseleys Food is an excellent substitute for Mother's Milk and may safely be given from birth.

It is neither malted nor peptonised and unlike many cereal foods will not create a tendency to rickets but can be used with marked benefit for that complaint.

TWO IS COMPANY.

The Story of a Plucky Girl's Love Affair.

THE sun was sinking slowly in the western sky, leaving behind it a glory which transformed the earth.

A girl sat alone on a sand dune out of sight and sound of hotels and humanity.

Clasping her knees with her slim, brown hands, she gazed seaward with rapt, dreamy eyes, feeling rather than seeing the beauty of the scene.

Behind her lay the bay, a gleaming, golden thread, bordered by long stretches of marshes which gave out a sweet, dank odour.

Before her the breakers rose and fell with a dull thud and roar, and far out as eye could reach stretched the broad Atlantic, glowing with the splendid opalescent lights of sunset.

"Heavenly," said the girl to herself. And then, aloud, "I wish I could have the Gorgon's head for just about five minutes with eyes before and behind."

"What a cruel wish, Miss Allen," answered a voice not five feet distant. "I have been standing here transfixed by the brilliancy of your hair and the picture you form against that grey background. Would you have me stand for ever?"

"Sit down, Mr. Franklin, and stop casting reflections on my hair; it isn't kind. Besides, it isn't half so red as the bridge of your nose."

"It is the sun which casts reflections, not I, Miss Allen. But I am afraid one is company and two a crowd."

"Not at all," said the girl cordially. "I put off sentimentality with my teens. Besides, I love mankind too much to send you away," she added archly.

"I see you don't forget old haunts, Miss Allen, when putting away childish things," he said as he dropped down on the sand beside her.

"No, nor old friends," she answered, with a note of affection in her voice. "Tell me," she went on, "what have you been doing since we parted three years ago?"

"Ranching, in the first place, and getting back my strength, in the second. Ah! it is a glorious life, Miss Allen; the finest in the world."

"That is what you said about painting and Paris, if I remember rightly," she said quizzically. "Have you forgotten our talk on this very spot the day before you left that summer?"

"Never," he said; "nor you, nor anything pertaining to that miserable, delightful summer. How good you were to a cranky old invalid! By Jove! what a sweet little thing you were, anyway!"

"That was three years ago, Mr. Franklin. I was but a child," she said, with assumed dignity.

"Let me see, you were eighteen then. I shouldn't call you decrepit even now. But tell me about yourself. What have you been doing?"

"Nothing interesting; just living and learning," answered the girl, pushing back her red-gold hair.

"Indeed, is that all?" the man asked teasingly. "Mabel, does that ring mean anything?" he asked suddenly, as he caught a glimpse of diamonds on her hand.

"A great deal," she said, mischievously.

"Mabel, you are not—? Please explain yourself," he begged.

"It means," said the girl, "self-denial amounting to poverty. It means worry amounting to brain fever and three wrinkles. It means effort amounting to hard work but happiness, and it means money amounting to fifty pounds."

"Tell me about it?" urged Franklin.

"Well," began Mabel, "once upon a time there was a girl who had a fairy godmother in the shape of a great-aunt. This aunt made the girl many beautiful presents. She then lent her a valuable ring and told her to be very careful with it.

"The girl went to the seaside one summer and gave it to her young cousin to take care of one day when she went in bathing. When she asked him for it, it was gone and, although they searched diligently for it for days, it was never found. Of course, the girl felt that she must replace it, and she did.

"My aunt never suspected for this ring is exactly like the other, and I never told her about it until it was all paid for. Mother found it out sooner and wanted to help me, but I wouldn't let her."

"But, my child, how did you ever save up fifty pounds?" asked Franklin, knowing Mabel to be a little spendthrift.

"Of course, I couldn't take it out of my allowance, for that was spent. One must dress, you know," she said, looking down at her pretty, flimsy gown.

"Go on; I am absorbed," urged Franklin.

"At first I thought of a dancing class, for it was the only thing I could do."

"Except swim," put in Franklin.

"I wrote invitations by the dozen," went on Mabel, "but each child had some excuse. They either belonged to other classes or were too busy. I did finally get about a dozen, however, and we had great fun over it.

"Arthur played the violin and Nan played the piano. We took up the drawing-room carpet and cleared out most of the furniture so there was plenty of room. It kept things pretty lively and did us all lots of good. Mother would always come and give us some sort of refreshment, and the boys loved it. When we stopped I had earned twenty pounds."

"Capital!" applauded Franklin, watching the colour come and go in the face beside him.

"After that I plunged into all sorts of things. Fancy-work first, but it was out of season. Then picture-frames and menu-cards, which sold very slowly. They brought me in about five pounds."

"Go on, please," said Franklin, as the girl paused.

"Now comes the sad part of the story. I turned literary and wrote stories galore; wrote about all the sad things and all the funny things that I had ever heard. I pored over encyclopedias and books of travel for local colouring.

"I searched through old newspapers for thrilling and exciting incidents. I spent all my substance in stamps and paper and I received each story back about a week after I had sent it, with the editor's thanks."

Franklin laughed until the tears came to his eyes.

"I am sure, if you had told your stories, Mabel, instead of writing them, you would have made a small fortune," he said, when he could speak.

"It does seem funny now," admitted the girl, "but it wasn't a bit funny then. Sometimes I would give up in despair, go to my room and—well, never mind. You're not a bit sympathetic."

"But I am, dear," he said, taking one of her hands and looking down into her saucy face. "I was thinking how brave and plucky you were to stick it out. Aren't you going to finish?"

"Yes," she said shyly, withdrawing her hand, "for this story ended happily. One day I was calling on a friend who had a Swedish girl visiting her.

"The talk drifted to art work of different kinds and the Swedish girl asked me if I knew anything about poker work, I didn't, and on the impulse of the moment she offered to teach me. I started the next day and in a month under her tuition had done some really lovely things. She said I had good hands for it, and you know grandfather was a sculptor. It all worked out beautifully.

"A cousin of mine was going to Brighton and offered to take my work with her and exhibit it at one of the big hotels. In a fortnight they were sold and I had orders for more. After that it was smooth sailing."

Mabel paused and they sat in silence, looking out at sea. Against the horizon a ship was sweeping majestically southward with all sails set. The moon was beginning to assert her silvery sway as the pink glow faded and the spirit of peace seemed to move upon the waters.

In the sweet beauty of the evening the two seemed to come closer together and then the girl began to speak again.

"I think it was all meant for my good. I used to be so restless before when I had nothing to do. Last winter I felt that I had a purpose in life. Don't think I advocate the new woman: but I do think we would all be better and happier if we had something definite and positive to do."

"Yes," agreed Franklin, "and that since you have been talking I have discovered your true vocation. It is myself. I need you. Would you, could you take me up, make a home for a lonely man, be the light of his eyes, the satisfaction of his heart?"

His voice was very tender, and as he leant over and looked into Mabel's face, she thought him the most irresistible lover in the world.

"You cannot be in earnest," she managed to say.

"More than I have ever been in my life, Mab. It is not a new thought. Three years ago, when you were the merriest, happiest child in the world, I began to dream of it. I believed myself to be a hopeless invalid, but the hope of coming back to you has been before me and I believe has helped to make me strong. Mab, you must, you shall love me!" and he caught her up in his arms.

"I do, I do," said a muffled voice from his breast.

"I see two's company and fwee is a cwowd," piped a small voice from behind, "but muvver says come home to supper. It's nearly over."

M. T. Wilkins.

Edith: "Oh, Ethel, what shall I do? Jack says he supposes it's all over between us, and that he'll send my presents back." Ethel (experienced): "Tell him to bring them."

"It is very kind of you, madam," said the tramp, "to give me such a splendid dinner." "Don't mention it, you poor man," said the kind-hearted woman. "But I will repay you," said the tramp gratefully. "I'll tell all my pals that you are a flinty-hearted termagant that ain't never known how to cook nothin' decent, so's they'll give your house the go-by and won't never bother you."

HELD APART.

The Story of a Strange Double Fraud and its Influence upon some Young Hearts, a Great Name, and a Famous Fortune.

By R. NORMAN SILVER, author of "The Golden Dwarf," "The Daughter of Mystery," etc.

CHAPTER THIRTY-TWO.

"What Could We Prove?"

Adeline, Lady Tarleton, was dead—dead suddenly and horribly. A maid had entered her boudoir upon some errand and found her, face downward, on the floor. When the startled servant raised the prostrate form and beheld the features of the dead woman, she shrieked and ran. The odour of almonds was in the air, and prussic acid, though a swift, is not a merciful poison.

Edward Stormont, hastily summoned to his sister-in-law's room, bent over her for a moment, and then rose. He had seen death too often not to recognise it.

The small phial from which she had taken the drug lay at his feet. Near was a sheet of paper, written upon. He picked it up. It was not in the dead woman's handwriting, but a bolder and more masculine one. Its first words riveted the explorer's attention. It was plainly a letter, and ran:

"My Lady,—I've done the job, as agreed—how you will soon hear—and am off. This time the girl is done for and no spoof about it. But you'd best look out for yourself. That newspaper fellow has put two and two together and has as good as tried to have me arrested. Luckily that fool of a promoted bobby who's been hanging round was too thick to see it and I slipped through.

By the bye, J. thinks I did for Hannah, and, what is worse, has twigged that there is something rummy behind the girl, whose existence he has somehow tumbled to. He's a smart hand, but do you make no mistake—if they come on me about H., I shall tell them who—I'll bet a thousand—did the trick. It didn't take me long to guess, once I had time to think things over. But you'd done me no great harm in stopping the old cat's breath—she was getting to be a drag on me—and I knew I could make you part just the same. Besides, I could have proved nothing about Hannah, you'd been too clever, and I didn't want to frighten you to no purpose.

Burn this. You shall hear from me later where to send the balance of the cash, so no more at present from—

"You Know Who."

Edward Stormont concealed the letter in his hand—it had stricken him with a horrid chill. A cluster of curious servants were whispering at the door—he sent one of them with a message to Paul Jerome, and, closing the door, covered the dead woman's face and lowered the blinds.

The war-correspondent came in quietly, perceiving, without astonishment, the grim tragedy that had taken place. The footman's outcry and blanched visage had prepared him for the worst.

The explorer gave him the letter. Paul Jerome read it deliberately. Then he sorted out a folded sheet from his pocket-book, opened it, knelt down by the still form on the floor and studied the fingers of one hand. He was making a cool comparison.

"Yes," he said, "it is best as it is, Stormont. I myself had put Ussher upon a clue which might ultimately have enabled him to hunt her down to a fate worse even than this. Needless to say, I did not anticipate that result."

He showed the explorer the finger-prints and told him all. Edward Stormont bent his head comprehendingly.

"Davenal was her maid," he observed, "at the time of Moira's supposed death. Heaven knows what happened then, but it is evident that Davenal knew enough to blackmail her Doubtless the woman's exactions led to her fate. Adeline must have grown desperate, as, now, confronted by possible, if not probable exposure, she must have grown terrified."

He re-read the letter. "'This time the girl is done for and no spoof about it,'" he repeated; "strange! Was she herself cheated by her assistants and the child preserved without her knowledge and consent? It is not impossible. And then Hannah Davenal's death may have been, in reality, the penalty of her deception."

The explorer drew out a match-case and lit a corner of the ex-steward's letter. It burnt steadily.

"No one must ever know," he said; "think of Irene."

The war-correspondent shivered.

"You are right," he answered, and together they watched the blazing document. When it was all consumed Edward Stormont dropped it on to the hearth and ground the ashes to powder with his foot.

"Will that avail to conceal anything?" asked Jerome, gloomily. "What of Hartigan?—he may be caught, and, not being actually a murderer, will probably elect to speak. Besides, will you not have to thrash out the question of Moira's identity? We seem to have taken it as demonstrated that she is your daughter, and, indeed, the circumstantial evidence is almost conclusive. But if she were put out of the way in order that your wife's fortune might pass, at your death, to Lady Tarleton, that object has been legally effected. Irene is now your heir; to make Moira so, you will have to reveal all."

Edward Stormont brooded over the problem. Then a light broke in upon his sombre visage.

"Guy loves her," he said, "and you love Irene. Let things be as Fate has made them. The dead past shall bury its dead."

"But——" began the war-correspondent. The explorer checked him.

"What could we prove at best?" he asked, "would not the law scoff at our fantastic tale of an empty coffin and a dead child that did not die. No. let well alone, when I die you will be the husband of a wealthy woman, Guy and Moira will have plenty with the Vanbrugh rent-roll and my private savings. I shall know myself, if few others do, the richer by a daughter, and Irene will be able to weep innocently for her mother."

He put away his match-case.

"Come," he added, "let the law don its spectacles and see what it can see. We will leave ourselves in Mr. Ussher's hands."

Despite the tragedy of their surroundings, Paul Jerome's lip twitched. The half-formed smile lost itself in a sigh and he went out of the room with the explorer.

CHAPTER THIRTY-THREE.

A Question of Secrecy.

"Thank you kindly, sir, 'tis well meant, but you'll let me say 'no' all the same. I'm not a poor man, sir, if I were, I've given you my word to be silent, and anyone in Groudle—man, woman, or child—will tell you that John Davenal's word can be trusted. And I'd rather there was no mention of money between us."

The speaker laid a slight but unmistakable emphasis on the ZOX for Neuralgia at Any Time.

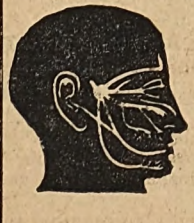
GIVES INSTANT RELIEF TO HEADACHE, TOOTHACHE, NERVE PAINS



Any Sufferer Sending Stamped Addressed Envelope May Try Zox FREE.

Neuralgia is a Disease of the Nerves, and most commonly attacks the nerves of the face. Its presence is announced by the most piercing darting pains, recurring in paroxysms, followed with brief intervals of relief; but hardly a moment elapses after a lacerating pain darts along the course of the affected nerve ere another shoots forth, inflicting pain equally distressing to the patient. The annexed cut presents in the prominent lines the nerves of the fifth branch, which are most liable to attacks of Neuralgia. All who suffer from this terrible pain, or from Headache, Toothache, or nerve pains generally, will be glad to know of ZOX, a Simple, Safe and easy Remedy certified free from injurious substance by no less an authority than Dr. A. B. Griffiths, F.R.S. The Proprietors offer to send Two Free Sample Powders to any reader of "Short Stories," who will send them a stamped addressed envelope.

ZOX is sold by Chemists, &c., at 1s. and 2s 6d. per box, or can be had post free from last syllable. Edward Stormont leant forward in the chair that faced the diver's—for John Davenal, no longer confined to his bed, sat by the sunny window of his room.

"You're right, Davenal," he said, frankly, "and I beg your pardon for thinking that, by making it your interest to keep it, I could add an iota to the value of your simple word. But, you see, I am quite a stranger to you, or I should have known better. Strange that we should be strangers, you and I—I whose blood runs in Moira's veins, you whom she has called 'father' for sixteen years."

John Davenal flushed. "It was a sweet lie in my ears, sir," he answered, "and, after all, I thought her my own flesh and blood, as you may say, believing her Hannah's child. But it seems wicked now, sir, that she should have been like my own child all those years while you, her true father, should have been wandering up and down in the earth, for want of just such an innocent life to cherish. And it's a sore shame to me, to think of my own sister's sin against you."

The explorer's face darkened. "No more of that, Davenal," he said; "quite possibly Moira owes her preservation to your sister and this fellow Hartigan."

"Like enough, sir," agreed the diver, "and though it can have been but for their own evil purposes, it makes it less awful to think of. But Hannah must have been a terrible woman, sir. However did she manage to keep the poor child fed and quieted while it was supposed to be lying dead, how did she contrive that it should have air when it was closed in that wooden shell and leaden casket, before she and Dennis, as they must have done, got it out and brought it to me?"

"It was not impossible," replied the explorer, rising; "some powerful sedative, daringly administered, and a cool, resourceful mind, were all that was necessary. The leaden casket is most ingeniously pierced with holes and no doubt the wooden shell was too. They must have carried off the latter with the child, wrapped up, I suppose, parcel-fashion. The child would be safer so, under the influence of the narcotic."

"Aye, sir," assented John Davenal, "and that was how it came to be flung into the Bay from off the breakwater, to lie there till, as I surmise, sir, Sir Guy's yacht, settling, broke it up and cut the plate in half so queerly. If it hadn't been for that plate, Moira might never have known another father than me."

The explorer bent over the diver. "Do you regret it, my poor friend?" he asked.

John Davenal started at the kindly expression.

"No, sir," he said; "it is better so—for Sir Guy and her. But I'm sorry she isn't going to have her rights in law—it seems a sort of injustice to the little lass."

Edward Stormont changed the subject hastily. "Not it," he retorted; "and besides, I have your promise, remember."

"Yes, sir," was the answer, "you have, and I'll keep it, safe and sound. And, after all, as you say, sir, there is the other poor young creature to be thought of, especially now that her ladyship has committed suicide. Then people do talk terrible, and mayhap the law wouldn't be satisfied in the end."

"That is just the position," said the explorer, evasively; "and now, if you will let me, Davenal, I am going to run away. I have still many sad things to do and to endure before the grave can close over one who has wrought both you and me great and lasting wrong. But enough of that; a day will come when we shall smoke a lonely pipe up at the Tower and listen to the echoes of wedding bells."

"Aye," replied the diver, rousing into cheerfulness; "love can drown a heap of unhappiness when it comes to its own."

"Yes," said Edward Stormont, bitterly, "if only the heart be young, Davenal. But when hearts are old they must sit down as best they may with their sorrow and loneliness. Nor Time nor Love can give me back those sixteen stolen years of Moira's girlish life. But a truce to our jealousies. I am tiring you and up at the Tower Irene will be waiting for Moira."

He opened the door of the diver's bedroom and called:

"Moira," he said, "we must be going off. Come and say 'Good-bye' to my hated rival."

There was a quick step on the stair and Moira ran up and into the room. The two men looked at her with a passion of suppressed tenderness in their bearing. She went to the diver's side.

"I have been trying, for the twentieth time," she remarked, with a little sigh, "to explain to Kit without—without explaining. Have you finished your talk?"

"Yes," said the explorer, smiling; "it ended with the usual topic—our jealousy of each other."

Moira smiled, too, and then sighed again. Then she took a hand of each and put them to her lips.

"I am very rich," she answered, unsteadily; "what other girl in the world has two such fathers?"

The hands she had kissed met and clasped. There was a tear on the joined fingers—it had come straight from Moira's heart.

* * * * *

And Mr. Ussher? What did his stolid official mind make of the ravelled skein left to him by Lady Tarleton's suicide? Paul Jerome cannot be sure how far the detective succeeded in reading the riddle, for he himself was forced to adopt towards the former an attitude of determined, if skilful reticence, and he who denies confidences has but little chance of obtaining them.

A criminal trial might have done much to open the lips of both. But the astute Mr. Hartigan was not pursued with any real vigour; there was a singular poverty of evidence against him in respect of his crimes, both achieved and attempted.

Lady Tarleton lies in the Lennox mausoleum, her darling object, after all, accomplished, for the Lennox fortune, in due time, will go past its rightful owner to enrich the daughter of a murderess. Well for Irene that she does not know, well for Paul Jerome that his ingenuity is able to cope, in some degree, with Irene's curiosity.

Part of the truth Irene had to be told, part her own quick wits discerned. But she does not speak of her mother, even to her husband; she guesses that the unfathomed past holds for her as much of terror as of mystery.

Yet she is happy, happy in her friendship with Guy and Moira, happy in her husband and her children. Jerome and she have built a dainty modern bungalow on the hill below the Tower—the great old gloomy place could never have been a home for them, and Irene, at least, shunned it with a nervous dread.

By now their new dwelling has ripened its red walls and gabled roofs in the sun and the sea air of Groudle Bay. When Edward Stormont is not to be found there he must be sought for at the Close, whither the years have brought a second Edward and a little maid with her mother's red-gold hair and a pair of limpid, steel-grey eyes. As they look up into Edward Stormont's something flutters at his heart. For the eyes of the little maiden are the eyes of his long-dead wife.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

A Nervous Sweetheart.

"WHAT are you to do," asks "PUZZLED," "when a girl writes you the most affectionate letters, but who is silent when you meet, and never says a word about love? When I try to kiss her, she always tells me I mustn't, and in many other ways she will not even give me a chance. When she meets me, it is for such a very short time that we cannot talk about ourselves, and she always has other engagements. Do you think she really loves me!"

* * * * *

Probably she does love you, if she writes you the letters you mention. I expect she is a little bit afraid of showing her love for you when you meet, and perhaps is so inexperienced in men's ways that she does not know how to act. That would account for her conduct when with you.

* * * * *

You should be very backward in your attentions for awhile. When she does meet you, treat her just as an ordinary friend, and talk about ordinary subjects. You don't want to rush right into talk about love, as it seems to embarrass the girl. When you get thoroughly used to each other's society, you can make your own declarations, and by that time she will know her own mind about things. You have evidently been taking her too much by storm, and it has made her feel embarrassed.

A Shop Assistant's Trouble.

"ALEX" (Glasgow) is in perplexity. He is a shop assistant, and very much in love with a young lady. He, however, could not possibly marry her at present, as his salary is very small. Now a month or so ago her father died, and left the girl's mother and herself in very straitened circumstances. The only relief they could get would be to go to Canada where they have a brother who is doing well. But this would be a great blow to "ALEX," who would thus be either compelled to marry the girl and share with her simple poverty, or to lose her perhaps altogether. How should he act?

* * * * *

There are two courses open for "ALEX." Either he must take steps to at once improve his position at home, or find some means of accompanying the mother and daughter to Canada. In the first case, he had better make a clean breast of his position to his employers, asking them for a "rise." If they refuse, then he had better save, by hook or crook, enough money to emigrate to Canada. When there, he should have little difficulty of getting work where he could be near the girl.

* * * * *

As a Scotsman, I imagine his chances ought not to be bad in a country where there are so many of his fellow-countrymen, who are only too willing to help a brother Scot. If the brother of the girl is, as you say, doing well, perhaps he might be able to place something in your way. Certainly the experiment would be worth trying.

A Lorn Soldier.

"SUNNY" (India).—Thanks for your letter, and the kind things you say about Short Stories, which I am glad to hear is read so much by your fellow soldiers. I can understand how much you wish to meet with a girl, but I cannot do what you ask. I advise you to send an advertisement, prepaid, to the matrimonial columns of one of the daily papers, either in India, or at home.

* * * * *

No doubt many girls would be willing to open correspondence with you, but it would be quite outside my province to introduce readers whom I do not know to each other. Failing that, why not invite one of your friends or relations at home to bring about the introduction? They know you personally, and would be better able to do so than a stranger.

Boy and Girl Etiquette.

"IF a boy, sitting in a tram, meets while there a girl of his acquaintance, should he pay for her fare when the conductor comes for the tickets?" This puzzles "ARTHUR," who says the question often arises, and he never quite knows what to do.

* * * * *

Unless, "ARTHUR," you have set out on the journey with the girl, it is no affair of yours to pay her fare. If she is a properly brought-up girl she would not let you do it. After all, if she is in the habit of travelling about, her parents will have given her the necessary money, and she ought not to expect you to spend your own, which is as precious to you as is hers to herself. On the other hand, if the girl is going anywhere with you, at your invitation, or is in your charge, then of course you will pay her fare.

Does He Love Her?

"M. D. S." met a young man the other day to whom she took a great fancy. But she did not show it much at the time of meeting him, as he did not reveal himself entirely to her until they parted. On leaving each other, they arranged to meet again, and "M. D. S." wrote, suggesting an appointment to the man, who did not reply. She then wrote again with the same result. Should she write once more and express her feeling for him, or let the matter drop?

* * * * *

Give him one more chance, and if he does not reply then, you must be assured that he does not wish to resume your acquaintance. In that case, you had better let the matter drop, and forget him. Better end the little affair now in its earliest stages, than later on when the wrench would be harder to bear.

A Country Mouse.

"EVA" is a country girl, who very rarely visits London. In a month's time, however, she will be passing through the city on the way to a friend living on the other side. Last year she met a man with whom she flirted a little. When parting, he said: "If ever you're in London, be sure to tell me, and we'll have a good time together." Should she ask the man to meet her as she passes through—she has no other friends in London—or would that course be unwise?

* * * * *

Certainly I don't think it would be wise for a girl who knows nothing of London, and who is on the way to visit friends, to arrange meetings with young men she only knows very slightly. But then, I do not know, either, what sort of girl you are, or what sort of man he is. All depends on the people themselves. If you were just passing through London, and knew exactly where you were bound, and the time you must be there, I should not think there would be any harm in his acting as your escort. But I would not recommend your placing yourself in his hands for "a good time," unless you thoroughly know London.

THE BOND BETWEEN.

A Romance of Real Life.

By BLANCHE EARDLEY.

PROLOGUE.

"Those whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder." The sacred words were droned in monotonous tones by a lean, apathetic curate. The church is empty save for the two principals—Margaret Heath and Vernon Grant—and the necessary witnesses. After the ceremony, the bride and bridegroom leave for Paris.

Digby Scarlett turns over his letters leisurely in the interim between breakfast and sorting a cigar.

"Ah, here's one from my friend and collaborator, the valiant Vernon. I wonder what the Paris postmark means? Any way, it can wait until I have written to ask the adorable Margaret Heath to be my wife."

This done, he opens Vernon's letter, and when he reads the news of the latter's marriage to the girl to whom he has just penned a proposal, he murmurs—

"Twice hit by the same hand, and both blows destined to die with me—to bleed internally. Not bad for a man intellectually my inferior! But the third blow I shall get in. My innings begins to-day." Then he leaves for Paris to join the happy couple at their invitation.

Scarlett and Grant at one time had practised copying each other's signatures, and Grant had been very successful in his imitations of that of his friend. Now Scarlett persuades him, for a bet, to sign his name to a cheque for a large amount, promising to make it all right at the bank when presented. This, however, he fails to do, and Grant is arrested and sentenced to fifteen years' penal servitude for forgery, Scarlett not even saying a word in his defence. Mrs. Grant goes to the prison to bid her husband farewell, and tells him that she will never have anything more to do with him.

The First Chapters.

It is the birthday of Lady Maitland, the young second wife of Sir Trevor Maitland, of Maitland Manor. As a birthday gift her husband says that he has decided to give her a daughter—at present she has an only son, Woolf—by adopting a girl, Ivy Strange, who had been discovered in the grounds some fourteen years before, and brought up with Muriel, the baronet's younger daughter. Jack Maitland, Sir Trevor's elder son, is in love with Ivy.

Lady Maitland resents the adoption of Ivy for fear that thereby her son will be cheated out of his inheritance.

Heriot North, an old friend of the family, arrives on a visit to the Manor, to pay his attentions to Agnes, Sir Trevor's elder daughter. He succumbs, however, to Lady Maitland's charms and neglects Agnes, which makes the latter much incensed against her stepmother.

One evening, when Lady Maitland retires to her room to dress for dinner, she finds there a man—Mike Holland, a burglar. He is gazing at a locket in which are the photographs of herself and a man. Holland says he knew the man (Lady Maitland's first husband) in prison, and threatens to expose her unless she pays him to keep silence. She accepts his terms. A letter is delivered to Lady Maitland by her maid, Mason, in response to which she meets Mike Holland in the wood at dead of night. He again threatens her, but she says she knows that her first husband is dead.

"Even if he is," growls the man, "Sir Trevor don't know that you was the wife of a convict; that might interest 'im, anyway, and you 'ardly wish that little fact to be known to 'im!"

"It does not matter in the least now, if he did know it," she answers coolly; "he would do nothing for the sake of his name and our boy's! I am quite safe! But," she adds, "I am prepared to send you twenty pounds when I hear that you have left Melton for London—anywhere—not before. Now, say whether you will accept my offer—it will not be repeated!"

He hesitates, and his cruel fingers itch to be at the soft, white neck gleaming in the moonlight; but twenty pounds is twenty pounds!

"'Ow shall I let you know I am in London?"

"A telegram with the words 'dress ready to send,' will be enough," she answers briefly. "I will send the money by a friend to the District Messenger Office in Regent Street for you to call for. I shall run no risks; the money will be in gold."

As the gloom hides her from sight, the baffled man sends an oath, strong and venomous, after her.

"Yes, my fine madam, you've scored again, but I'll get my own back one day! To think that after 'anging on all these years, my old pard should kick the bucket just when 'is life 'ad got so valuable!"

Jack Maitland goes down to the lodge at the park gates to see the lodge-keeper's wife, Mrs. Parkins, and ask her if she has any of the clothes in which Ivy Strange was found, as the latter has said she will not marry him until the mystery of her birth is cleared up. Mrs. Parkins promises to look, and then she suddenly recollects something. When brushing Ivy's hair one night she noticed a mark, hidden under her curls—the mark of a broad arrow!

THE BOND BETWEEN.

EIGHTH CHAPTER.

The Face on the Balcony.

AFTER his first sensation of horror at hearing of the sinister birthmark on his dainty love's white brow, Jack pulled himself together. On second thoughts it was not so very frightful, and could mean nothing more than an ordinary coincidence; for between the innocent life of Ivy and the shadow of shame there yawned a very wide chasm.

"Why, Mrs. Parkins," he said to that worthy dame, "how do we know how it got there? Perhaps it was marked on the child as a means of identification. Anyway, I intend to use it as an important clue in my search for the parents, or whoever last was in possession of her."

Mrs. Parkins shook her head. "No, Mr. Jack, sir, that mark was put there by no 'and. Ivy was born with it, Mr. Jack; and, beggin' your pardon, sir, I don't see 'ow it will 'elp you much."

"Look here, Mrs. Parkins," he said impressively; "I want you to tell no one of my visit to you this evening; keep it to yourself."

"That I will, Mr. Jack," she replied, "and I will look in the old store cupboard in case there may 'appen to be anything I forgot to throw away."

He shook hands with her silently. She had in former years been an under nurse at the Manor and her homely face had been a haven of refuge to him when some childish terror had sent him to bury his curly head in her ample lap.

"Thanks, awfully, nursie," he said, with a smile, relapsing into the old title. "Oh, by the way, have you mentioned to anyone else what you told me about the mark on Ivy's brow?"

"No, indeed, Mr. Jack," she rejoined earnestly. "Parkins and me was afraid it might make folks look queer at 'er, so we kept it to ourselves, and did not even tell the squire for fear 'e should keep 'er away from Miss Muriel."

"Thank Heaven!" Jack breathed under his breath. Aloud he said, "Well, I know I can trust you to keep it a still greater secret now, nursie. For my sake as well as Ivy's."

As he drew near the Manor swift steps came running lightly down the gravel drive, and when they came in view he saw that it was Ivy and Muriel.

"Ah, Jack," said his sister with a laugh. "I came with Ivy half way to the lodge, as it was dark; but now I am going back, and you can chaperon her!" Then, with a gay "Good night" the girls parted, and Jack turned back with Ivy.

"Darling," he said, "I am going to begin my quest very soon now, and than when all is made clear we will be happy ever after!"

Her hand tightened on his arm. "It seems so vague, Jack" she sighed sadly; "there is nothing to go on—not even a name! I am afraid you will give me up as a bad job!"

"Don't talk like that, Ivy!" he said gently. "For your dear sake, as well as my own, I am going to do what I can, and I have an idea that I may succeed—in time."

She smiled lovingly. "You make me hope again, Jack, that I shall meet my mother!"

"Darling," he whispered, "you shall! Don't despair. I shall leave no stone unturned until I have found a clue. I shall go to London the beginning of the week and get the help of a good detective. Now tell me how you enjoyed the evening with Muriel," he went on. "Did you see the pater?"

"Y-es," she replied; "but perhaps it is my fancy, Jack, both Sir Trevor and Lady Maitland seemed just a little distant in their manner."

"Ah, that is because they know I love and am loved by you," he murmured. "I am not altogether in their good books just now, but I have you, and nothing else seems to matter."

At the lodge gates he paused. "Sweetheart, I suppose it is useless to ask if a single memory lingers in your mind about your babyhood?"

She shook her head. "No, Jack, I remember nothing, except strange faces, ever new; and sometimes a great deal of noise, then quiet."

He kissed her tenderly on the brow where the soft, burnished hair lay, hiding the significant birthmark.

"Good night, little sweetheart!" he said tenderly. "Sleep well."

When, a few minutes later, he turned towards the Manor, a woman slipped by him, and would have broken into a run had he not put out one strong hand and stopped her.

"Who's that?"

A voice answered unwillingly, "Mason, sir!"

"Mason," he exclaimed in surprise. "What are you doing out at this hour?"

"It is my evening out, sir," she replied sullenly. "I am always allowed out till ten."

As she hurried on he stood still and looked after her thoughtfully. "It strikes me that that woman was after something she had no business about. But it's no affair of mine, if the servants are given evenings out," he laughed. "At present I have thoughts for just one thing!" But he did not guess how nearly allied to that one thing was the business of Mason!

* * * * *

When Mason entered the Manor she was just a little breathless, but her black eyes were shining and her sallow face was flushed. She waited attentively on her mistress, Agnes Maitland, and then, when her duties were finished satisfactorily, she stole down to the door of Lady Maitland's boudoir.

"May I come in, your ladyship?" she murmured.

"I am too tired to see anyone to-night, Mason," replied Lady Maitland coldly. She was sitting in front of her table, while her wonderful copper-tinted hair was being brushed by her own particular French maid, Félice.

"If you have any message for me put it down on the table."

A sullen admiration had crept into the serving-woman's attitude towards her mistress since the occasion on which she had persuaded Sir Trevor to allow her to stay.

"Excuse me, your ladyship," she answered; "it is not a message in writing, but something I wanted to say."

Lady Maitland turned to the silent woman still brushing her hair.

"Félice, I think I have forgotten that book I felt in the drawing-room on the couch; bring it up to me."

The woman left the room obediently. Then in a quick, abrupt voice, Lady Maitland said:

"Well, Mason, be quick and say what you have to say. I am in a hurry."

Swiftly the woman stooped, and murmured a few whispered words in her ladyship's delicate ear.

"Believe me, my lady, it's true," she said earnestly; "and since your ladyship's kindness to me the other day I would do anything to serve you, your ladyship—indeed I would."

For an instant the white, blue-veined hand toying with a silver scent bottle quivered ever so slightly, then Lady Maitland raised her eyes and gazed at the woman who was eagerly waiting for her to speak, vainly attempting to read her thoughts with her keen, black eyes. But the mind of the woman in the chair was not so easily read.

After a pause, in which she had seemed to pierce beyond the soul of her now apparently devoted servant in that one brief glance, Lady Maitland turned her gaze once more upon her reflection in the mirror, a slight smile curving the lines of her mouth.

"It seems almost a pity, Mason, for so much zeal to be thrown away. In future reserve your energies for your domestic duties, instead of bestowing them upon wild flights of unbridled imagination! I am at a loss to understand why you should come to me at such an hour with such a tale!"

The woman flushed with angry mortification, and her mouth set in an ugly line. She had been almost hungering for a word of self-betrayal from the lips of the mistress who had so cleverly outwitted and baffled her the other day; but now she met again with the same cold hauteur and surprised disdain.

"Your ladyship will excuse me if I ask one question?" she said, obsequiously, lowering her eyes.

"Be brief!" was the curt reply.

"Does your ladyship know that in mending your black lace gown the morning after Miss Agnes walked in her sleep, I missed one of the silver tassels that hang from the sleeves? It was one off the right sleeve, your ladyship, and it seemed as though it had been torn off."

She stopped, as though expecting some exclamation, some sign that her words had been listened to; but Lady Maitland was coiling one of her long, soft strands of hair round her fingers, a bored expression on her face.

"I looked for that silver tassel, your ladyship," she went on, doggedly, "but it took time. It was nowhere in the Manor, nowhere in the garden. But it was my day out to-day, and as I went through the spinny about teatime I saw something shining on the ground. It was your silver tassel, my lady." Once more she halted, but no comment came from the smiling mouth of her mistress.

"Would your ladyship like to know where I found it?" she said, leaning forward, desperately.

"Have you not already told me, Mason?" replied Lady Maitland, calmly. "I am sorry you took so much trouble, because the gown is not worth it!"

"It was lying near the old oak, my lady," persisted the baffled woman; "and after I had picked it up, I—saw what I have told you about already!"

Slowly, and with each graceful action intensified by the loose, clinging négligée of soft white, Lady Maitland rose from her table, and faced the maid who had gone to such lengths to find a simple tassel missing from her gown.

Mistress and maid gazed into each other's eyes for the space of a second, and under the steady, contemptuous glance of the mistress, the shifty, glittering beads of the menial fell.

"You are a clever woman, Mason," said her ladyship slowly; "but like all clever people of a certain class, you are apt to spoil the effect of your cleverness, by a too liberal sprinkling of stupidity—and that is fatal to success in any enterprise, you know! Don't let me have cause to correct your conduct a third time; I shall not be inclined to pass it by with silent contempt, as I have done before. Now, leave my room, and send Félice to me."

She turned away, the long mane of warm-coloured hair still clinging to the back of the chair behind her—and in the crafty eyes watching her, there dwelt a strange look, half fear, half hate—wholly wonder!

"Is that all your ladyship wishes to say to me?" Mason murmured in a respectful voice.

"That is all, Mason! I require nothing else!"

"Good night, your ladyship!"

"Good night, Mason!"

When Félice had finished disrobing her mistress and had left her for the night, Lady Maitland stepped across to her husband's dressing-room on the other side of the corridor. It was empty, he had not yet come upstairs. She wondered whether the search had been very long for the lost brooch, and a slight smile flitted across her face, as the memory of poor Parkins' consternation recurred to her.

As she turned to leave the room, a sudden thought made her hesitate. She closed the door and went swiftly towards a cabinet by her husband's dressing-table. It was not locked, and she drew out something small and glittering. She looked at it curiously, the pupils of her eyes dilating until the violet in them grew black under the influence of a suppressed excitement. A slight shiver shook her, and her mouth quivered involuntarily.

"This may be useful," she murmured. "He will not miss it, there is another in the drawer. And I shall feel safe, in case—in case——" Her thoughts trailed off into a tangle of tremulous speculation, and stepping softly from the room, she slipped back into her own.

As she locked her new toy in a sufficiently secure hiding-place at the bottom of a long drawer where she kept her private correspondence, a gentle sigh fluttered to her lips.

"Forewarned is forearmed," she murmured. "I don't think that woman meant anything more than an attempt to surprise me—unless it really were the case, and she did see. But even so—that is powerless to hurt me now—and I shall take care that I keep myself from such petty vampires in future!"

She lifted her head, and a low laugh came from her lips.

"They little guess how strong I am to fight—not with the useless weapons of supplication and fear, but with the two-edged sword of brain and strategy!"

A slight noise from the direction of the window stopped the laugh on her mouth, and sent an expectant look into her eyes.

The long windows that led out on to a balcony had neither the curtains nor blinds drawn, and anyone outside could see quite plainly into the room.

"What can that be?" she murmured. "Surely——"

She rose quickly, and went up to the windows. As she did so, she caught a glimpse of a sallow face disappearing over the balcony. With a splendid courage she flung open one of the long French windows, pierced the darkness with keen eyes, and saw a figure running swiftly in the shadow of the house.

As she gazed, it came suddenly forward under the pale gleam of a moon-streak, and, standing motionless for a moment, turned its face towards the window on the balcony. Lady Maitland raised her hand to her mouth to stifle the cry that rose to her lips. For the figure was that of a man, and the face was one she had hoped never to see again!

NINTH CHAPTER.
The Return of the Wanderer.

The fog was settling down for a three days' stay, and the passengers arriving at Charing Cross by the Boulogne and Folkestone mail, looked cold and apprehensive about reaching their respective destinations in such a sea of uncertainty.

One man alone was glad to see the train slowing into the station, and when he stepped out of the Pullman carriage on to the platform, he gazed round with a sigh of content.

"Well! I never thought I should inhale a fog with delight!" he murmured; "but after sixteen years absence from it, it's just like greeting an old friend. After all, there's nothing like a long stay abroad to make a man a rabid patriot!"

A porter carried his traps to a hansom, then said: "Where to, sir?"

"The Orient Club, Hanover Square," was the reply, and the hansom bowled off cautiously, wending a hazardous way through the maze of vehicular traffic in a London fog.

In one of the long, narrow glasses on either side of the hansom, the man took a keen and swiftly scrutinising glance at himself. Apparently the inspection pleased him, for he leant back with a pleased smile on his sunburnt, refined face, and stroked his long, sweeping moustache with thoughtful fingers.

"Yes; the years have changed me considerably," he murmured. "No one would recognise me now, not even my best friend; or"—and the pupils of his slightly narrow-set eyes contracted suddenly—"even my worst enemy! I shall now feel able to enjoy myself with a free conscience, and revel once more in the intoxication of London gaiety!"

Arriving at the Orient Club, he made arrangements to stay some weeks, and wrote his name in a bold hand in the "Board" book; then was shown to his room. The hall porter gazed at the signature thoughtfully. "That gentleman can't 'ave been 'ere for many years," he muttered. "I don't recollect the name; but then comin' from foreign parts, it's not likely that I should remember 'im."

He looked at the signature again. It was an uncommon one, out of the usual rut of names, and the hall porter conned it thoughtfully. "'Digby Scarlett,' it's a name not easy to forget once you've seen it," he muttered.

Upstairs in the bedroom he had engaged, Digby Scarlett was dressing for dinner. He meant to enjoy himself this first evening in London. A long exile from civilisation had bitten him with the desire to indulge in every extravagance.

In the dining-room of the club he looked about with curious eyes. He knew no one; and though his name as a traveller and writer was probably known to most of the men present, personally he was a social pariah—longing for the sound of his fellow-creatures' voices, yet hesitating to take the first step towards acquaintance.

After dinner he picked up an evening paper and glanced down the column of amusements. "Let me see," he muttered, "if I can pick out a musical piece with one or two familiar names in it. I want to see some faces that I know."

But everything was new; all the old landmarks seemed to have been washed away by the tide of time. Just such names as "Irving" and "Tree," with other leading lights remained in the old places; but the gay, fascinating little dancers, and bird-throated choristers had made way for younger and fresher successors.

He put the paper down with a sense of disappointment.

He was beginning to realise how much alone he was, now that he had returned to his native country; far, far more lonely than when in the heart of forests, or on the dusty plain of deserts. For then, the great forests and deserts had drawn him, through the medium of mystery and star-lit nights, into the bosom of fellowship; they knew he understood, and was not one of those fiends of civilisation that wanted to build cities, or hew down their young children for timber.

But, in the heart of London, the unceasing hum of humanity fell with a meaningless roar upon Digby Scarlett's ears. The voice of the people roused no answering note in his soul, for his heart was not with them, and the cry went over his head.

"Excuse me, won't you? But if you are looking for a decent show, there is an awfully good turn at the Empire to-night;" and starting quickly round, Digby Scarlett met the frank, unembarrassed gaze of a good-looking young fellow, with a fair, boyish face, that was peculiarly attractive to the jaded eyes of the older man.

"Thanks for the tip," he smiled, and a gleam of dazzling teeth a woman might have envied threw into sudden contrast the brown of his skin, and inky blackness of the tired, restless eyes. "How did you guess that I was looking for such frivolous dissipation?" he continued; "had I the air of a pleasure-seeker?"

The boy laughed, and slightly reddened. "Sitting behind you, I could not help noticing that you were taking all the theatres in turn down the column, and when you put the paper down and did not move, I guessed that you had found nothing to please you; so I ventured to speak to you."

"I am more grateful than I can say," Digby Scarlett replied. "The fact is, I am feeling very much alone. This is my first evening in London after sixteen years of a nomadic pilgrimage; and I have the odd sensation of being a stranger within my own gates!"

The boy looked at him curiously. The restless eyes, aquiline nose, and burnt-looking skin, all betokened a man of a roving nature, of many moods—some, probably, not pleasant ones. The smooth black hair—grey on the temples—lent him an air of distinction; and the heavy, dark moustache concealed his mouth—the true index to his character. But his voice was cultured, and the note of isolation in it appealed to the boy's imagination.

He drew a card from his pocket, and handed it to the older man. "That is my name," he said, with a simple dignity. "I am also alone in town for a few days; I shall be most happy if you will let me be of any service to you."

The other replied by a vivid smile, and stretched out a long, sinewy hand. "Thanks, awfully!" he said. "I have no such details as 'cards' on me just now; but my name is Digby Scarlett."

The boy's eyes dilated with astonishment. "What! The 'Digby Scarlett' of the Royal Society of Antiquaries?" he said, in an awed tone. "Why my father's favourite book is 'Wonders we Walk on,' that you wrote."

A slight flush mantled the tanned skin of the traveller. "I am afraid you over-rate my work," he said. "I am a very poor member of the Society. In my youth I wrote fiction. But I have not yet made myself acquainted with the name of my new friend," he went on, hurriedly, as though anxious to change the subject; and then, looking at the card in his hand, he read, "Mr. John Maitland, Maitland Manor, Melton."

"Ah! I used to know Melton once," he said, musingly; "but that was long ago. It's a pretty county, and if the recollections of my boyhood are right, it had pretty girls in it, too!"

Jack Maitland was silent. The vision of a sweet, flower-like face, rose up in his mind. Who, better than he, could speak of the beauties of Melton?

"I see; I have sent your thoughts back to their native county," said Digby Scarlett, with a somewhat cynical smile; a feeling of envy rising in his heart for the capacity this boy had to love, and respect, a woman.

"Yes," replied Jack, a retrospective smile touching his mouth, "my thoughts did take a momentary flutter to their nest. But that will not prevent me from doing justice to my post as pilot to you in this little village!" he laughed gaily. "May I have the pleasure of accompanying you to the Empire this evening to see the 'turn' I recommended?"

The two men left the club together, and soon were watching a "rose ballet" from the stalls of the Empire.

As Digby Scarlett sat beside his so strangely-found companion, and listened to the hopes and aspirations of the boy, twenty-three years his junior, his sinister mind reviled the fate that had withheld from him the right of fatherhood. His isolation was all the keener because he knew the boy would pass out of his life in a few days, leaving him with a sense of intensified loneliness.

"Will you dine with me to-morrow?" he said, when they rose to go.

Jack Maitland hesitated. "It's awfully good of you, Mr. Scarlett, but the fact is, I am not certain that I shall be at liberty. I have some business to transact that may take all my time."

"Anyhow, I shall see you at the 'Orient'?" queried the older man, almost anxiously.

"Oh, yes," said the boy, flattered by the obvious desire for his society. "And I am very nearly certain that I shall be free."

As they took up their coats, something dropped from an inner pocket of that flung over the arm of Jack Maitland. Digby Scarlett stooped and picked it up. It was an envelope containing some hard substance like cardboard, probably a photo of some sort.

A small group of people separated him from his companion; so slipping the envelope into his pocket, he followed after him, keeping the tall, well-set-up figure in sight until he reached the foyer, and there the fog was so bad, that after a little futile search among the crowd waiting for carriages or for friends, Digby Scarlett hailed a passing hansom and drove to the Orient Club.

"I shall probably find him there," he murmured, "this fog is enough to make a man lose his head."

But arriving at the Orient he found that his friend had not yet arrived, and with a shrug of his shoulders, he went to his room.

"I wish the boy were in," he murmured. Then a cynical laugh rose to his lips. "To think that I—Digby Scarlett—should worry about the probably intentional absence of a young boy I shall very likely never meet again!"

He took off his coat, and felt in the pocket for a cigarette; as he did so, he touched the envelope that he had picked up for Jack Maitland. He drew it out slowly, and looked at it. Then a curious light crept into his eyes—a mocking, sinister gleam.

"I suppose this is the photo of the lady of his dreams!" he muttered. "They always carry them about—when they are young! I wonder what she is like. The boy ought to have good taste—he knows how to choose good wine!"

Slowly, and with curious eyes, he opened the envelope, and drew out the piece of cardboard. It was a photograph—he was right in his surmise—and of a woman, too!

Under the light of the electric globes he scanned the picture with puzzled eyes. It was an amateur likeness, badly taken at that; but he could see that it was the picture of a young girl in a muslin dress; her mouth was parted in a smile of tender query, and the shadow of a large sun-bonnet threw a shade into her eyes. But it was a face that made Digby Scarlett—hardened man of the world as he was—draw in his breath with a sibilant sound, and his eyes deepen and glow with startled admiration.

"Truly, 'a face to make an old man glad!'" he murmured. Then, with a sudden exclamation, he drew the photo nearer to him, peering with an intent gaze into the eyes of the girl looking up at him.

"Great Heavens! I see now what made me wonder where I had seen a similar face before!" he murmured. "It is strangely like, and yet unlike! This has the softness of the pearl; while that other had the hardness of the diamond! Yet, if it were not for the lapse of years, I should almost be inclined to think that I was a young man in love once more!"

He laughed harshly. "But, by this time, that other one is probably fat and grey, old and commonplace! I congratulate the boy upon his choice! But I will take the liberty of keeping this 'picture'!" he said, with a bitter smile. "He has the original—I will retain the copy!"

* * * * *

"So you have no better clue than the one I have already received, Mr. Maitland?" And the mild, blue eyes of Detective-Sergeant Gilbert Chase sent a sudden flash of inquiry into the face of Sir Trevor Maitland's son and heir.

Jack Maitland shook his head. It was the morning following the night of the black fog, when he had missed his interesting and celebrated acquaintance, Digby Scarlett. When, after a few hours' aimless wandering, he had found his way back to the Orient Club, the whole place was in darkness, and at breakfast he was told that Mr. Scarlett had already left the club.

Two hours later he found his way to the office of the man, in whose hands he intended to place the tracing of his sweetheart's birth and parentage. The few details regarding the finding of the child by the lodge gates when a baby of three, he had already related to the eminent detective; and, with the exception of the one secret shared alone by himself and Mrs. Parkins, he had kept nothing back.

"I have told you all I know," he said evasively. "It was fourteen years ago, and there is no linen with any distinctive marks to trace by. All the inquiries I have been able to make, I have asked—you know all, except——" He stopped suddenly, flushing like a guilty child.

A slow, persuasive smile flickered in the mild blue orbs of the detective. He had sounded the depths.

"Ah!. I knew the important evidence would come last," he said drily; "it always does!"

Jack Maitland faced him squarely. "I can trust you, I know—and my confidence with you will be sacred."

"For twenty years," said Gilbert Chase, slowly, "confidences have gone in at one ear and out of the other—but never through my mouth! Pray proceed, Mr. Maitland!"

"It is this," replied Jack; "I have found out that on the brow of 'Ivy Strange' there is a—a scar—a mark hidden under her hair. It may mean something to go by—or nothing."

"Yes, yes, of course, Mr. Maitland," said Gilbert Chase, thoughtfully; "it all depends upon the nature of the mark. Was it caused by a knock, or was it a birthmark?"

"I fancy it must have been born with her," he replied, a feeling that he was desecrating his innocent young love in discussing her with a stranger, making him answer curtly.

"Ah, yes; and what is the mark like?" murmured the detective; "has it any distinctive shape?"

Jack hesitated, and, for a moment, almost regretted that he had decided to put it in the hands of a detective; they were such cold, unemotional creatures.

"Yes," he answered abruptly. "It was the mark of a—a broad arrow!"

For an instant the detective's eye flickered with a startled surprise; he was not accustomed to being taken unawares.

"Ah, I see," he murmured. "Have you a photo of the young lady?"

Jack put his hand in his pocket gladly. The worst had come and gone; the rest was in the capable hands of Gilbert Chase. Suddenly he uttered an exclamation of surprise. The photo he had cherished for so long had gone.

"What a pity," said Gilbert Chase; "it might have helped me."

"I had it last night," he replied ruefully; "it must have dropped out of my pocket in the hurry of putting on my coat in the fog."

"Well," said the detective, rising, "I don't think I need detain you any longer, Mr. Maitland. If I want you particularly I will send for you, or come down to Melton. Good-day, sir."

When Jack reached the Orient Club he found Digby Scarlett lunching.

"Well?" said that gentleman, with a sudden smile, "what do you mean by losing yourself last night? I was almost worried."

"I'm sorry if I put you out," said the other; "I missed my way, and you had gone out this morning when I came down to breakfast. I don't fancy I shall stay long in town," he went on; "I have a good mind to return to-morrow."

Digby Scarlett sighed.

"Lucky man to have somewhere to return to. I would give twenty years of my life to be in your shoes!"

Jack Maitland blushed with a sudden impulse.

"I wonder, Mr. Scarlett," he began, hesitatingly, "whether you would come down with me to Melton? We can give you some good hunting, and my father would be awfully glad to meet you."

Digby Scarlett hesitated. Then the memory of the photo in the envelope reposing in his inner waistcoat pocket decided him.

"Thanks, awfully, Maitland," he said, with genuine feeling. "I will be delighted to accept your invitation."

The following afternoon Jack Maitland and his new friend started for Melton and Maitland Manor—and what lay beyond.

TENTH CHAPTER.
A Bolt from the Blue.

It was the half hour after lunch, and Lady Maitland was in her boudoir, talking to Heriot North. It was a dainty nest, in which the dominant tone was white, touched here and there by flashes of old gold, and on marble pedestals stood antique vases filled with yellow flowers.

There was an absence of the ordinary knick-knacks and prettiness usually associated with such apartments; nothing seemed wanting in the slightest detail, yet there lacked something indefinable that puzzled and eluded detection. It seemed almost as though the beautiful mistress of the Manor feared to impress her taste upon a room into which those who were antagonistic to her may come.

There were no draperies to the door or windows; Lady Maitland was wise to avoid them, they harboured mischief. Instead, great jars stood in the window corners, filled with a profusion of blossoms.

Two silver frames held the only photos in the room; one was the likeness of Sir Trevor Maitland, the other of Woolf—her son. But that of the boy was on a small table where the mother could see it from her couch.

The gown she was wearing was of cream cloth, an attractive design in tea-gowns; while round her waist was a girdle of glittering old gold, finishing in two heavy tassels at the hem of her gown.

Like her surroundings the mistress suggested an idea of cold beauty, the white and the gold of the room claiming kindred links with her gown and hair.

Heriot North had returned from town the day before, and had called to pay his respects at the Manor the following afternoon. It was not until he had entered the boudoir with Lady Maitland that he spoke about the subject on which he had called.

As his eyes dwelt upon the tall, lissom figure of Sir Trevor's wife, the thought flashed into his mind that she resembled some mediæval saint in her aloof attitude towards the more ordinary weaknesses of human nature. In all the many times he had seen her, he had always encountered the same placid graciousness, heard the low, caressing voice always strike the same note, even when the barely veiled insolences of her step-daughter Agnes were aimed at her.

She glanced up, and caught his gaze. "Well, Mr. North," she laughed lightly; "about what are you thinking so seriously?"

"I was thinking," he said, "that you were wasting your sweetness on the desert air when you let yourself be imposed upon by such hangers-on to your charity as the specimen of human nature for whom I executed your commission of pity the other day."

A startled gleam flickered to her eyes, as she said carelessly: "Ah, I—I—have not seen the poor creature myself. I have taken over the protégé of a friend. Was he very—awful then?"

He laughed. "Just about the most unmitigated ruffian I have ever seen! I am glad you were spared the sight."

"How was it you saw him then?" she asked, a vague wonder in her mind whether she had done well to trust this man after all.

"I had just entered the District Messenger depot," he answered, "and given up the letter containing the gold you had intrusted to me, when I noticed a particularly objectionable-looking man loaf in. My erstwhile police-court experiences as a reporter told me that the fellow had a peculiarly intimate knowledge of the interior of His Majesty's prisons; and as I turned to watch him, to my surprise I saw that the beggar was handed the letter I had left for your protégé."

He leant forward earnestly, and said, "Allow me to offer you the advice of a man who has seen more of the 'seamy side' than you can ever imagine, Lady Maitland. Be very careful of the characters of the people to whom you give your charity. I should have every inquiry made in future, if I were you."

She shivered slightly. If he only knew that the protégé against whom he warned her had returned to Melton, and was still watching for some opportunity of meeting her, Heriot North would wonder still more at her strange propensity!

She had imagined every possible reason for the man coming back to the place where his liberty was in jeopardy, but could evolve none from the many points she had raised. Now she only waited for him to make some sign.

What had happened that he should be so careless of his safety? was the question she had asked herself over and over again.

She looked up, and saw Heriot North gazing at her with a strange questioning in his eyes.

"I will certainly avoid all promiscuous charity in future, Mr. North," she said gaily; "but I will be glad if you will not mention this particular case to my husband. He may think me foolish, and—I should not like to vex him. The man was recommended to me as a worthy subject! But come," she laughed, "let us talk of something else. Had you much time for theatres in town?"

He roused himself with an effort. He had been thinking what a symphony she made in the white and gold, and the firelight sending ruby tints in and out the waves of her hair.

"I went to the 'Empire,'" he replied; "and it certainly was not particularly gay," he laughed. "The evening I went there was a thick fog on. By the way, is Jack in town now? Because I fancy I saw him at the 'Empire.' I could not swear it was he, the fog hung over everything; but there was someone remarkably like him there, chatting and laughing with some man."

Lady Maitland raised her eyes. "Really? He has been in town nearly a week now, I believe. What was the man like? I wonder if he is a Melton friend."

"I cannot remember," he said carelessly; "I did not see his face."

He rose abruptly. "I must go now. I will look in again soon if I can."

"Won't you come in to dinner?" she said sweetly. "We shall be a family party—only the girls, Sir Trevor, and myself. And it must be lonely up at 'The Hollies' by yourself."

He bit his lip. "Yes, it is. So lonely that I dare not let myself come here too often, Lady Maitland, in case——"

"In case what?"

"'The Hollies' becomes so unbearable that I throw it all up—and go away!"

"You must not say that," she said quickly. "What will your friends do? We are beginning to rely upon you already, Mr. North."

He turned to her passionately.

"'We!' Who is 'we,' Lady Maitland? If, for a moment, I could imagine that—that you—cared——"

He stopped suddenly, something in her cold, proud face freezing the mad words on his tongue.

For a moment there was silence; then he stumbled to the door.

"Forgive me—if you can!" he muttered. "I shall never forgive myself!"

"Mr. North," said Lady Maitland's low, sweet voice; "one moment; I wish to speak to you."

He came back wonderingly, fearfully, to where she stood, a graceful, imperious figure; her eyes shining with sad pity and a gentle dignity in her manner.

"Mr. North," she said slowly, "I want to show you something. Look! You see those two photographs—my husband and—my child?"

He bowed his head dumbly.

"Well, Mr. North," continued the sweet voice, "between those two human banks the river of my life is flowing, evenly and peacefully. I have no desire for it to leave them behind and merge into the cruel, open sea of wreckage. I am happy—now; and"—her voice broke slightly—"help me to remain so. Be my friend—my loyal, true, disinterested friend," she continued, an undercurrent of eagerness making her speech falter. "You don't know how much I need one!"

She put out her hand and he took it in his with trembling fingers.

"Your kindness is more than I deserve," he murmured. "But if ever you will give me the opportunity of proving my devoted friendship, I will not fail you! For once in my life I have come face to face with a good, pure woman; and I thank God for it!"

He turned on his heel, and the door closed noiselessly.

For a while Lady Maitland stood motionless, then a slight smile curved her lips, and her eyes sparkled brilliantly.

"That was a very clever bit of acting!" she murmured. "And yet—and yet, I am sorry for the man. He takes me seriously! But he will be of infinitely more service to me as my friend than—anything else. I wish he had not seen that man. It was awkward! He called me a 'good, pure woman'!" she laughed. "So I am—so I would have been had not Fate intervened!" She clasped her hands passionately, then, after a pause, the calm returned to her face, and she left the room.

Half an hour later Sir Trevor Maitland entered his wife's dressing-room. He had had a long, successful meet. The fox had broken cover early, and had given them a good run, and he was consequently in high spirits. In his hand he had an open telegram.

"My dear," he said, after his wife had dismissed her maid. "this is from Jack, sent from St. Pancras. He will be here to-night to dinner, and brings a friend with him. He did not say who, but says for a few days' sport. They will probably be here in a short time now."

Lady Maitland laughed. "Very well, Trevor. I will be glad to see the boy again. Heriot North told me he saw him at the Empire with a man. This is probably the friend he is bringing back with him."

"Look your best, darling," said her husband. "I want Jack's friend to envy me my wife."

Lady Maitland laughed. "I am wearing my white tulle gown; that is sure to fascinate him!"

When her husband had left the room, and she was clasping her bracelets on her wrists, another interruption came. It was Ivy Strange, who asked to be allowed to see her for a few moments.

"Well, Ivy," said her ladyship graciously, looking at the girl's sweet, soft beauty that, waif as she was, gave her the bearing and appearance of an aristocrat. "I have a few seconds to give you, that is all."

The girl came forward slowly; her simple serge dress and felt hat setting off her fresh, pure face and figure.

"I am sorry to have disturbed you at this hour, Lady Maitland, but I have a message for you—a note."

The woman's heart throbbed suddenly.

"A note; who gave it to you, Ivy?" she said sharply.

"A boy in the village saw me coming up to the Manor," replied Ivy quietly, "and asked me to bring it for him, and give it into your hands only. I hope it is not very important," she said shyly. "I am afraid I loitered rather!"

But Lady Maitland was not listening to the girlish excuses. She had torn open the envelope, and was reading with glassy eyes the illiterate words scrawled on the piece of paper.

"The man you got the laugh over is now going to laugh at you. You lied to me. I know that your first husband still lives. I 'ave seen 'im. Send or rite by return to M.H. post office, Chorlton, inclosing five 'undred pounds or I will call at Manor and tell all."

The woman sat crushing up the piece of paper with desperate fingers. Her luck was leaving her. Was that man telling the truth, or was this only a threat? She wondered why he had not trusted Mason with the letter as before. The voice of the girl roused her.

"Are you ill, Lady Maitland? Can I do anything for you?"

Her words set a train of thought working in the woman's mind. Who better than this girl to be trusted—not confided in—but made use of? Servants were never reliable; this innocent child would think no harm, and levy no toll.

She put her white hand affectionately on Ivy's shoulder. "No, dear, not ill; only just a little upset at some news that affects someone dear to me. I wonder, will you write a letter for me, dear?" she went on caressingly. "I will not keep you very long."

"Oh, yes, with pleasure!" said the girl eagerly. "I shall be only too pleased to do anything for you that I can."

Lady Maitland smiled. "And I feel that I can trust you not to chatter like Muriel, or Woolf would about it, afterwards. You are a wise little girl, Ivy, and I think I know someone else who agrees with me in appreciating you!"

The girl blushed. "I will write for you now, if you wish it," she said simply.

"Thank you, dear," said her ladyship. "Sit down at my table and write: 'Am sending half; will forward to London address. Not advisable here for various reasons.'

"That will do. Don't sign it; my—my correspondent will understand," and a harsh laugh came from between her lips. The girl obeyed, then, under Lady Maitland's instructions, put on the envelope: "M. H. Post Office, Chorlton," which was the village adjoining that of Melton.

"Thank you, dear child," murmured her ladyship, and, stooping, she touched the girl's brow with a light kiss. "I will not forget you for this service. I think I will make you my amanuensis, you write so prettily. Now run away and post that for me."

When the girl had slipped away, Lady Maitland took the dirty piece of paper and dropped it in the fire. "I only wish I could do the same with the writer!" she muttered, then, with a bitter smile, she looked at herself in the glass.

"You are to fight! This creature must be silenced! The demands will only go on increasing until the end comes. And how do I know he is not lying? Yet, why should he risk coming back here? But that girl will conduct any correspondence for me." She smiled. "Nothing will be done that can compromise myself. For my boy, I will take all precautions! Now to go and see this wonderful friend of Jack's."

With a tender smile on her lips she went softly downstairs. From the drawing-room a sound of laughter and merriment floated to her ears. Above all she heard the shrill voice of Woolf, talking excitedly to someone.

Lady Maitland paused on the threshold, and sent a quick look round in search of Heriot North. He was not there. Another man, tall and dark, his back turned to her, was talking to Agnes, who was unusually bright and affable.

"Here's mummie!" cried Woolf, "at last!"

There was a lull in the conversation, as attention turned suddenly upon the woman in the doorway, whose violet eyes, under the shadow of burnished hair, seemed to shine and glow like sapphires.

"Ah!" said her husband's voice, "let me introduce Jack's friend, my dear."

The man came forward slowly, a gleam of dazzling teeth throwing up the blackness of his moustache. Sir Trevor Maitland's wife glanced up at him with a swift smile of welcome.

"This," continued Sir Trevor, "is Mr. Digby Scarlett—my wife!"

(Another long instalment next week.)

WHEN a damsel tells a young man that she has dreamt about him the night before, it is high time for him to begin to be careful.

BUSINESS MAN: "I thought I'd surprise my clerks by getting down to the office at the opening hour." Customer: "And did you?" "No; there wasn't one of them there."

FATHER: "Your schoolmaster can't be such a mean, unkind man as you make out. I noticed his son has all the toys he can possibly want." Tommy: "Why, those are what his father takes away from the other boys."

A COUNTRYMAN walked into a newspaper office to advertise the death of a relative. "What is your charge?" he asked of the clerk. "We charge eight shillings per inch." "Oh!" said the countryman, "I cannot afford that. My friend was six feet three inches."

DIAMOND CUT DIAMOND.

A Story of Many Passions.

Containing the Incident Depicted on the Cover.

Marie Furness walked rapidly up the broad stairs of Oak Grange, and entered the room which had been assigned to her as the guest of its owner and occupier, Sir Geoffrey Wilde, Bart.

She was a dark-skinned beauty, with evidences of Castilian origin in the flashing, jet-black eyes, the glistening coils of raven hair, the small, delicately-shaped head and lithe, willowy form, and, most of all, in the dusky olive of the flawless complexion.

The face, even in repose, was sufficiently striking. But, as she swiftly closed and locked the door of her room, its appearance and expression were beyond description.

The thin lips curled, half in defiance, half in scorn. The flashing eyes were cruel, not with passive, but active hatred. Every line of the dark, fascinating face was pregnant with passion—passion that will neither be quenched nor subdued.

With clenched hands and heaving bosom, she began rapidly to pace the floor of her room, her small feet falling almost noiselessly on the soft, rich carpet beneath. And as she walked, the inward working of the mind revealed itself in the dusky face, and showed that the two great opposing forces which govern frail humanity fought in the breast of this beautiful, passionate woman, so strong to love, so strong to hate.

At last the pent-up storm within broke forth in quick, fierce whispers—suppressed, subdued—as if afraid of being overheard.

"I could kill her—yes, kill her!" she said passionately. "And if the worst comes—— Oh, Heavens, I could not bear it—I will not! I would rather die than see that pale-faced, passionless graven image, who calls herself by the name of woman, the wife of this handsome, gay young Earl of Deercourt! If I cannot marry him, I swear she shall not! But I must—I must! Surely I am not lacking in loveliness that I cannot command love if I will?"

The cruel lustre of the dark eyes faded away, and a soft, dreamy light took its place. The whole face grew eloquent with love and longing, as intensely passionately potent as the hate and scorn which had preceded it.

Stepping quickly over to her dressing-glass, she critically scanned the lovely oval face, now transfigured with love, which it reflected. And, as she gazed, she smiled reassuringly.

"No," she said softly—"I would not exchange with any woman in all the county. I have nothing to fear on that score. And yet he scarcely notices me, while he dances perpetual attendance on this Lucille Warwick. Oh, how I hate her!" And the small hands clenched, while the lithe form quivered with a rush of fierce emotion.

Her eyes wandered to the window, overlooking the small but exquisitely preserved park of Oak Grange. Far away in the distance the gleam of a white dress among the great old oaks caught her eye, and an involuntary exclamation escaped her lips.

With straining eyes and rigid form she gazed out to the distant trees. Two people were there—a man and a girl—the former tall, the latter slight and graceful—almost, but not wholly screened by the thick foliage of the park trees. And they were standing in the attitude of lovers.

Nor was this all, for the eye of Marie Furness, quickened by jealousy, recognised in these unconscious lovers the forms of the Earl of Deercourt and her rival, Lucille Warwick.

With a sharp pang at her heart, she sank back into a chair, and tried to think calmly and collectedly. Long she sat thus, and when at last she rose the beautiful face was hard and cruel, and alight with the lust of revenge.

* * * *

Downstairs Sir Geoffrey Wilde was sitting, with knit brows and tightly-compressed lips, in the temporary seclusion of the Grange library.

No eye was present to read and interpret the dark, forbidding expression of his face, and in this security he abandoned the mask of polite indifference which was so habitual to him, and, like the beautiful but terrible woman in the room above, gave rein to the passions which dominated him.

Sir Geoffrey Wilde was a powerfully-built, well-groomed man in middle life. His title was unencumbered by the usual responsibilities incumbent on the possessor of such worldly honours—the responsibilities of wealth.

But though the baronetcy was unencumbered, the estates which accompanied it were not. Indeed, he scarcely knew where to turn to satisfy the clamorous demands of certain Hebrew gentlemen whose acquaintance he had contracted in the hour of his difficulties.

On the other hand, the young Earl of Deercourt, who had not long passed his majority, was immensely rich, with estates and personality large enough to satisfy the needs of half-a-dozen baronets such as he.

But this was not all. For, by right of succession, the life of this young Earl of Deercourt was the only thing that prevented him—Sir Geoffrey Wilde—from inheriting this immense wealth. It was, therefore, greatly to his advantage that the present Earl should die without issue. Indeed, the more speedily the Earl—to use his own expression—"hopped the twig," the better for himself.

Finally, Sir Geoffrey Wilde was extravagant, ambitious, and unscrupulous. But though he sometimes even boasted of the first of these three virtues, he was sufficiently a man of the world to effectually conceal the remaining two. And yet his every thought of late was dominated by these twin factors.

Avarice had become to him a veritable god, to whom he looked for salvation from his many difficulties. And to the attainment of that end he was prepared to adopt any course, practise any treachery, consistent with his own personal safety.

Thus, even in crime, he was a coward. But how was this end to be achieved? He, and he alone, must be the Earl of Deercourt, and that before the year was out, or it meant ruin—positive, hopeless ruin—to himself.

"My bad luck!" he muttered savagely. "One miserable life—the life of a mere boy—between me and all these riches!" And he ground his teeth in impotent anger. "The unsuspecting little fool!" he continued. "And he looks upon me as his counsellor and guide!"

He laughed sardonically to himself.

"I wonder what he would say if he knew that the counsel I give him as to the management of his estates was not so disinterested as it appears? I wonder what he would say if he knew that my motive in asking him here is to watch for an opportunity of ridding the world, without risk to myself, of the only obstacle in my path to fortune?"

Again he laughed softly to himself, but a moment later the brows came together again and the whole face hardened to a look of sinister reflection.

"I wish I could see my way out of this," he muttered.

"But I must be circumspect. Whatever happens, there are plenty of guests in the house—that is one consolation. I wonder what the fool is up to now? Paying court, perhaps, to that feminine volcano, Miss Marie Furness. But he barely notices her, for all the sidelong flashes of the black, passionate eyes.

"Truly, men are fools in their choice of women! No, I expect it's the blonde, not the brunette—the iceberg, not the volcano." He paused, and then, "Good Heavens!" he muttered hoarsely, "what if the boy should marry!"

He got up agitatedly and walked to the window. And there, under the distant park trees, his quick eye caught the same picture which had caused Marie Furness, in her room upstairs, to utter that involuntary exclamation of rage, and the look that crept into his face too was hard and cruel and full of sinister resolve.

An hour later Sir Geoffrey Wilde was sitting at his ease in one of the big lounge-chairs that occupied the shady verandah which skirted the southern wall of Oak Grange.

His face had again assumed its habitual expression of supreme indifference, and he sat languidly smoking a choice Havana and lazily watching the blue-grey spirals of smoke emitted by his thin, unsympathetic lips. Most of his guests were out riding, while a few were on the river, to which the park sloped down picturesquely in pleasing undulations of rich verdure.

There was a step on the verandah, approaching him from behind, but he did not stir. A moment later, someone stopped almost on a level with his chair, and he heard the soft rustle of a woman's dress. He let the hand fall that held the cigar, and noiselessly turned his head.

Marie Furness was standing on the edge of the verandah, gazing out over the wide sweep of sunlit lawn to the park beyond. Clearly she had not noticed him, for her back was towards him, and he could not but admire—critical as he was in his judgment generally—the willowy grace of the slender figure and the perfect poise of the delicate head.

Presently she half-turned, and, still unconscious of her host's presence, picked up a newspaper that lay on a wicker stand at her side. But it was evident the paper had little interest for her, and Sir Geoffrey, watching her with calm, impassive face, made a mental note of the fact that this "feminine volcano" was in that state of internal restlessness which immediately precedes, or follows, an eruption.

Suddenly the whole expression of the dusky face changed. The eyes dilated, and became fixed on the newspaper in her hand, as if attracted by some irresistible fascination. The bosom heaved convulsively, the dry lips parted, and the breath came quick and gasping.

Involuntarily she lifted one trembling hand to her heart, as if to still the tumult within.

Sir Geoffrey, roused out of his languid apathy, followed with his own the direction of the fascinated eyes, till he had mentally located the precise spot on the paper upon which the eyes were riveted.

Then he noted the number of the opposite page, which was within his line of vision, and, having concluded his mental notes for subsequent investigation, he slowly and noiselessly turned his head on its satin cushion and languidly closed his eyes to simulate slumber.

The act was not remarkable in the man, for, except when it suited his purpose, a strict observance of the first principles of honour was not one of Sir Geoffrey Wilde's weaknesses.

The next instant he caught the girl's voice—dry, hard, bitter, relentless—and, hardened man of the world as he was, a chill ran through him as he listened.

"Ah!" came the whisper, "this—this is my revenge! She shall never marry him! Once rid of her, my path will be clear! This very night I will do what I have to do—yes, this very night!"

Sir Geoffrey heard the rustle of the paper as it fell from the girl's fingers, and a quick, stealthy, retreating footstep told him that he was alone.

For fully ten minutes he remained motionless in his chair. Then he rose and picked up the fallen paper. He was not long in discovering what he wanted. It was an account of the death of a well-known Society man who had been found dead in his bed under peculiar circumstances.

As Sir Geoffrey read what those circumstances were, and connected them with the impassioned words of Marie Furness, he sank back in his chair with an involuntary shudder, not of horror but of fear.

Presently an idea came to him, and he gave a great start. The moisture stood upon his forehead, and he gripped the arms of his chair to steady himself. Then the thin lips parted, a low, mirthless laugh escaped them, and, rising with a sudden bound, he cast the paper from him and re-entered the house.

* * * * *

Evening had closed in over Oak Grange, lights glowed from the many windows, and Sir Geoffrey's guests, returned from their various excursions by river and road, chatted gaily in groups in drawing and billiard-room, or wandered along the moonlit paths of the old park. It was in the latter place that Sir Geoffrey met the solitary figure of Marie Furness.

The overwrought girl, unable to endure the incessant babble of the guests in the Baronet's drawing-room, had escaped to the grounds to think out her plans uninterruptedly. But her watchful host knew of her going, and, having a word or two to say to his lovely guest before she retired for the night, had followed her.

"Miss Furness!" he said in affected surprise as he came up with her. "Surely the gods are propitious at last! I looked for you all the afternoon, but you were nowhere to be found."

The girl looked up quickly and in some surprise.

"I am sorry," she said. "I had several things to do this afternoon—letters and other nuisances—and I spent the time chiefly in my room."

"Ah!" drawled the Baronet, "I never write letters, and, having no inclination to sit astride a horse or wrestle with an oar, I looked for you in the hope of having a quiet little chat. But you were invisible, as angels, they tell us, generally are. I suppose, if it were otherwise, we should not appreciate Paradise when we get there."

A half-suppressed sneer curled the girl's lip, but the Baronet was, or appeared to be, unconscious of it.

"By the way," he continued, "you spoke of your room. May I inquire whether it pleases you?"

"Charmingly, thank you," responded the girl.

"That is fortunate," said Sir Geoffrey, with a smile. "You are not so difficult to please as Miss Warwick."

The girl started at the name, but controlled herself immediately.

"Indeed?" she said indifferently.

Sir Geoffrey carefully knocked the ash from his cigar.

"Oh," he said, "perhaps I, in the capacity of host, should not have mentioned it. But my vanity is, I will confess, a little piqued. Miss Warwick has expressed some dissatisfaction at her apartments, so I have been compelled to effect an exchange."

The girl was listening now with breathless interest, and the Baronet, stealthily watching her from beneath his brows, saw the rapid changes of the dusky face and played his last card.

"Fortunately," he continued, "the Earl of Deercourt came to my rescue, and offered to place his rooms at the disposal of the lady. So the exchange was effected with less trouble than I had anticipated, since, as you may not be aware, every habitable room in The Grange is at present occupied. But this is scarcely an interesting topic." And he lightly turned the conversation into more general channels.

But his words fell unheeded on the girl's ears, and they soon returned to the house and mingled with the guests. But throughout the evening Sir Geoffrey followed the movements of Marie Furness, watching her with lynx-like eyes, for the plan he had conceived depended solely upon her for its success.

At length all the ladies had retired for the night, and most of the gentlemen—among them the Earl of Deercourt—had followed their example.

It was now long past midnight. The drawing-room was deserted and in darkness, and in the billiard-room, three men, tired of play, sat smoking through the early morning hours, and, under the influence of a freely-circulating decanter, conversed in low tones on all conceivable and inconceivable subjects.

These three were Sir Geoffrey himself, Colonel Barnet of the Royal Horse, and Sir Manfred Lewin, K.C., a barrister of considerable renown. They were all three addicted to late hours, and were, therefore, in no hurry to retire.

The door of the billiard-room stood wide open, commanding a view of the stairs. A close observer might have detected an air of restless alertness on the part of Sir Geoffrey, but this passed unnoticed by his two companions.

Suddenly he put his finger to his lips, and, without a word, rapidly extinguished the lights. Then he moved noiselessly over to his companions.

"There's a little comedy going forward upstairs," he whispered. "For myself, I'm not surprised. Come softly, and see the fun!"

The two men rose, and, without a word, all three crept noiselessly up the dark staircase and peered along the dimly-lit passages above.

Presently they saw the figure of Marie Furness, loosely clad in dressing-gown and slippers, creeping stealthily along in the shadow of the wall. Stooping before the door of the Earl's room, she cautiously turned the handle.

The door yielded, and, with one quick glance of the black eyes around her, she entered the room. The men looked at each other in amusement, expecting to see the door close. But, a moment later, the girl reappeared, and, noiselessly closing the door as before, vanished down the long, dim passage in the direction of her own room.

"Humph!" ejaculated Sir Geoffrey under his breath. "Not so exciting as I had anticipated!" But there was more of exultation than disappointment in his voice.

"She looked anything but amorous," he said grimly.

Sir Manfred looked uneasy.

"Are you sure it's all right?" he said, addressing Sir Geoffrey. "To me, she looked uncommonly like a woman who means mischief!"

Sir Geoffrey smiled reassuringly.

"Not she!" he said whimsically. "The incident is, perhaps, mysterious, but fraught with little danger to any but herself." And he looked meaningly at his companions.

The men laughed, and, separating, retired to their respective apartments.

* * * * *

Dawn was breaking, clear, blue and cloudless, when Lucille Warwick awoke from happy dreams to the happier realities of consciousness.

The Earl of Deercourt—handsome, gay, and debonair, had asked her to be his wife, and she, desiring nothing half so dearly, had consented. For she loved him with all her sweet, gentle heart, and, in her soft, shy, maidenly way, almost worshipped her handsome, light-hearted lover.

She had learnt the art of self-control, and this, together with the modest reserve that was natural to her, made her appear cold and passionless in the eyes of the outer world. But in her heart a well of infinite tenderness ran deep and undiminishing, that made her love well worth the winning.

Suddenly she became aware of a strong odour of escaping gas which permeated the apartment. Leaping lightly out of bed, she examined the brackets in her room, and found them in no way defective.

Then she remembered that the Earl's rooms were directly beneath her own, and a sickening dread of impending danger to the man she loved took possession of her.

Hastily attiring herself, she ran rapidly down the broad stairs, and stopped at the door of her lover's room. All was still within, but a dense, suffocating fume stole through the narrow crevices surrounding the door, and her heart turned sick within her.

Knocking loudly upon the panels, she ran breathlessly to the door of Sir Geoffrey's room, where she repeated her summons. But no response came to her knocking. All was silent.

In an agony of alarm and dread, and scarcely knowing what she did, she began vigorously to beat on all the doors along the passage, calling excitedly for help, and, in a very few minutes, the whole house was astir.

In a few rapid words she communicated her fears to the other guests, and Colonel Barnet, Sir Manfred Lewin, and several others made their way to the door of the Earl's room. Sir Geoffrey now made his appearance, and, learning the nature of their alarm, accompanied them.

Knocking still brought no response, so without further formality the door was flung open. A rush of gaseous vapour made them recoil, but, the next instant they plunged into the room, threw open the high windows, shut off the rapidly escaping gas from the two brackets, both of which had been turned on to their fullest extent, and, with a sickening fear at their hearts, turned towards the bed.

The young Earl lay there, pale and motionlesss. At first they feared he was dead, but among the Baronet's guests was a gentleman who, purely as a hobby, had studied both chemistry and medicine.

After a brief examination the Earl was pronounced to be still alive, though in a very critical condition. Restoratives were immediately applied to the unconscious Earl, and a groom hastily dispatched on horseback for a neighbouring doctor.

It was not until two hours later that the young Earl, feebly opening his eyes, looked about him. He was still too dazed and ill to speak, but his eyes met those of Lucille Warwick, who had begged to be allowed to remain in the room, and a contented smile crept about the mouth, while his eyes closed wearily.

All danger being now at an end, Colonel Barnet and Sir Manfred Lewin, remembering the incident of the preceding night, gravely recalled it to Sir Geoffrey's memory. With his consent, they went in search of Marie Furness. But not a trace of her could they discover anywhere.

She had been seen in the passage when it was first whispered that the young Earl was dead, and one told how she had been seen to reel when she heard it, and go tottering blindly, with shaking limbs, along the passage.

But there inquiry ceased, and Marie Furness, terrible alike in her love and her hate, the dupe of a deeper and more subtle plotter than she, disappeared as completely as though the earth had swallowed her up.

Slowly—very slowly—the Earl of Deercourt was nursed back to health. As soon as possible he was conveyed to Deercourt Towers, and a fortnight later was on his feet again.

Not a little of his progress towards recovery was due to the loving ministrations of his affianced wife, to whom he owed his rescue from the deadly poison of the escaping gas, and before the year was out a countess' coronet surmounted the gold coils of her hair, and she was happy in the perfect love which her husband bestowed on her.

And Sir Geoffrey Wilde? Baulked in his villainous designs on the life of the Earl of Deercourt, and threatened with ruin which he had not the courage to face, he shot himself on the very day when the marriage of the Earl with Lucille Warwick put an end to all his hopes of succeeding to the title and estates of Deercourt.

Telling of the Unmasking of Two Cardsharpers.

Starting as a gentleman, by force of circumstances a jack of all trades, by profession a raconteur. Such was my record when I arrived in London, whither the fame of my stories had preceded me.

Almost directly I received a letter from Herbert Falkner, millionaire, social lion, and otherwise known for his fine stables and genial hospitality, requesting me to do him the honour of a visit to his country place in Derbyshire. It was my fortune to know a man much in his favour and at the time his guest at Whiteacres, the Derbyshire place.

My initial appearance before Mr. Falkner's guests was to be at dinner, and I spent the last moments before leaving my room in reading over the list of topics I had jotted down for use during the evening. A raconteur is expected to fill in every lull, every dull moment. Suddenly there fell upon the quiet of my room these words:

"We must run it up to 5,000 to-night! Do you hear? We must."

I stared round the room. It seemed as if the sound had come through some tapestry in a small recess. Perhaps the tapestry covered a secret door, but there was no time to investigate. A footman was waiting to conduct me to my host.

An interesting party was assembled at dinner; that is, they were interesting to me as types of study. As conversationalists they were failures, for the only subjects on which they talked fluently were cards and horseflesh.

I selected my stories accordingly. The guests were apparently familiar with the customs of Monte Carlo and every gaming place abroad, but I told them tales of the Wild West, where I had spent several years in a mining camp, of games of faro and poker that fairly made them gasp, and after dinner they said I must teach them some points in the game of poker.

Sitting opposite to me at the table was a broad-shouldered, dark man, whose eyes, black and set rather closely together, never left my face. His lips were thin and bloodless, and his long, rather aquiline nose had a cruel curve about the nostrils.

But what most attracted my attention was his odd trick of drumming almost constantly with his right hand, now on the table, now on the arm of his chair, and now on his square chin.

The instant he spoke I recognised the voice I had heard in my room. The man was Captain Marchand, a British officer with a French name.

His wife sat at my right, a handsome woman with a profusion of soft brown hair and beautiful blue eyes, which I learnt in a short time were playing havoc with the mental peace of a young fellow named Chadwick. He was a handsome, boyish-looking fellow, one of those chaps who imagine themselves violently in love with every pretty face they meet.

Mrs. Marchand seemed to have caught her husband's peculiar trick of beating that maddening tattoo with her fingers. It fairly got on my nerves, but no one else at the table appeared to notice it.

She had long, slim, nervous-looking hands, covered with rings, the kind of hands one always associates with an artistic temperament, and they were terribly restless. Never for one moment did she keep them still, but played the tattoo with maddening persistency.

During the evening I was kept busy explaining the intricacies of poker, after which I watched the guests yield to the fascination of the game. Soon little piles of silver and gold appeared and disappeared at the various tables. Excitement grew apace.

Finally interest centred at the table where Marchand and young Chadwick played alone. At the beginning the latter won, and with a triumphant gesture hauled in his little pile of gold. The excitement brought a sparkle to his eye and daring to his tongue, and he kept Mrs. Marchand near, declaring that she brought him luck.

When Chadwick won she clapped her hands in girlish glee, and once or twice I caught a cynical smile on Marchand's lips. Clearly her presence was turning Chadwick's head; he played recklessly.

"I'll make it £400!" exclaimed Marchand.

A hush fell on the room. Then rose Mrs. Marchand's clear, sweet voice:

"How exciting! Oh, Mr. Chadwick, go one better. Make it £500."

The other guests rose and gathered round the table. Falkner stood on the hearth-rug, glancing towards the group with troubled eyes. I heard him say under his breath: "The lad can't afford to lose that amount."

I joined the spectators just as Chadwick called for another card. Then I felt a thrill pass over me. The blood rushed to my face, and instinctively I clenched my fist.

Mrs. Marchand was gently tapping the back of Chadwick's chair. Each tap meant that she was telegraphing Chadwick's hand to her husband.

My first impulse was to denounce them then and there. Then came an inspiration. With something of the Captain's cynical smile, I too, began to drum on the back of a chair, and this was what reached the startled couple:

"You—are—caught."

Captain Marchand turned rigid as he grasped the arms of his chair, and for a single instant his eyes met mine. I smiled grimly, enjoying the situation. The turn of events had a different effect on Mrs. Marchand. She fainted away, at which the Captain's composure returned. He sprang to her rescue, and the table was overturned.

When Mrs. Marchand recovered, the guest clamoured for the finish of the game, but Marchand shook his head, perhaps because I drummed a rhythmic warning:

"Don't play!"

Over an hour passed, and I was sitting in my room, cogitating whether I should inform Falkner that he was entertaining a pair of very clever sharpers, when a servant brought me a message from Marchand asking for an interview in his sitting-room.

I found him waiting for me with an ugly scowl on his face; but his wife, pale and with her hair in artistic disarray, was charming in her new role of beauty in distress.

Marchand came directly to the point

"Well, what do you intend to do?"

"Nothing," I replied nonchalantly. "It is your game. If you and your charming wife are suddenly summoned to Paris to-morrow the matter ends. Otherwise, I think Mr. Falkner"—I shrugged my shoulders significantly. "And, by the way, it might be just as well if you refunded to Chadwick the money you've won since he's been playing with you."

"And then?"

"And then I shall have one more good after-dinner story to tell when I return to town—that is all. Mr. Falkner shall never know."

"You are very generous. You can have no idea to what straits, we, my husband and I, have been driven."

With a well-simulated sob she buried her head among the pillows.

"'You will pardon Mrs. Marchand's lack of self-control. As you say, I think a trip to Paris is what she needs, what we both need; and I think," he added, with a smile, "we all need something to drink after the events of the evening. Will you join us in a whisky-and-soda? Come, don't say no."

As he spoke he poured out some whisky from a cut-glass decanter and added some soda with perfect coolness and calm. I did not care about drinking with such company, but could think of no reasonable pretext for refusing, so tossed off the whisky-and-soda with a cheerful "Here's luck!" which had an ironical note in it.

I stepped backward towards the door, which he held open. Then, suddenly, I felt my head reeling and a loud singing in my ears.

When I woke it was morning and I was in my own room, fully dressed, lying upon my bed. Dazed and giddy, I tried to collect my thoughts, and at last the remembrance of the previous evening flashed upon me.

I rose and staggered to the room occupied by Captain and Mrs. Marchand, but, as I suspected, the birds had flown and the nest was empty. Taking advantage of the stupor into which the glass of drugged whisky had thrown me, the clever pair had guiltily absconded, leaving no trace behind them.

Our host heard with amazement my tale of their treachery and trickery, but the scandal never became public. And the only reason for the telling of the story is that during a recent trip to Paris, I recognised in one of the reigning stage beauties Mrs. Marchand, who once telegraphed a poker hand to her fellow trickster at Herbert Falkner's country house.

Not the Only Pebble.

The Love Story of an Everyday Young Man.

"Are you really going to leave us, Grace?"

John Branscombe asked the question in an unsteady voice, and deep anxiety was clearly discernible on his countenance. He was not what people would call a handsome young man; his face attracted by its sterling honesty rather than by its physical beauty.

He was twenty-one, tall, broad-shouldered, and strongly-built; his whole appearance denoted steady perseverance—"plodding," as some would call it—and not the smartness and dash which invariably attracts although it may not always be so reliable as the characteristic possessed by John Branscombe.

Grace Ashurst was seventeen. She was tantalisingly pretty, and gave promise of great beauty as she developed into a woman. She was vivacious, quick in all her movements, with rosy lips and eyes that were constantly changing in expression.

When she assumed a demure air, she was more bewitching than ever, and even when she was angry she only made herself more lovable.

John Branscombe had aroused her anger on more than one occasion by adopting a protective attitude; her flashing eyes abashed him, but the outburst only added fuel to the flame of his love. "I want you, I want you!" he would say to himself, apostrophising the absent Grace; she half-realised that he was in love with her, but her mind was occupied with other thoughts, and she smiled at the thought.

"He would never do for me!" she declared to herself. "I want a man with more—more—oh, more soul! John is too ordinary for me!"

She was going to leave the northern town and take up her abode in the Metropolis for the purpose of receiving a thorough musical education. She had a good voice and the idea of becoming a prima donna enchanted her. She had urged her mother to permit this, and finally Mrs. Ashurst had consented, much against her own inclination.

"It would be better for you to settle down here, using your gift (as you could do) for the amelioration of the lot of those less fortunate," said the widow. "Nevertheless, as you seem to have set your heart on it, I will consent."

Her lips moved as though she were saying more, and Grace guessed what was passing in her mind.

"Don't think me ungrateful, mamma!" she implored. "I am consumed by this desire! I do not wish to leave you alone, but you can come to London, too, and we can be happy together!"

"Never mind, dear!" said the self-sacrificing mother, her own feelings driven aside by her love for her daughter. "I will stay here, and you must write often and come to see me as frequently as you can!"

So it was arranged, and John Branscombe learnt of the plan only on the evening preceding Grace's departure

"Are you really going to leave us?" John repeated the question as Grace did not reply.

She was gazing at him with mingled amusement and vexation. What did it matter to him? What right had he to speak in a tone that signified reproach?

"Why should I not?" she asked defiantly.

John was nonplussed. He scarcely dared to suggest that he had some claim to consideration, so he thought of saying that she ought to study her mother's happiness. He remembered, just in time, that this was not a fair remark to make; it was to be assumed that mother and daughter had agreed, and, moreover, it was not a straightforward answer. He was confused and remained silent. Grace laughed teasingly.

"Dumb!" she said triumphantly. "Now, please do not patronise me any more! Yes, I am going away to-morrow, so I shall say 'Good-bye!' to you this evening, Mr. Branscombe, and I shall not see you again for some time. During that period, you will recognise that the fact that we went to school together does not give you the right to act as guardian for ever——"

"I wish it did!" interrupted Branscombe eagerly and earnestly. "You want someone to protect you, Grace! Life is full of dangers and troubles and"—he was trembling with suppressed passion—"and I could guard you, I could devote myself to you."

"But I do not require your assistance, Mr. Branscombe!"

she retorted stiffly. "I think I can manage without you!"

If he had been better versed in the subject of love, he would not have made the false step that followed; but he could only see that Grace was going away, that she would meet with men of more fascinating exterior, that she might be attracted to one of these, who would not make it his life's work to secure her happiness. And, above all, he saw her slipping from him, and the thought of life without Grace was intolerable!

"Yes, Grace, you do want me!" he said. It was a mixture of pleading and an effort to convince her that she would be happier with him than with anyone, because he would slave to make her happy. But Grace heard the words without understanding the feelings that prompted them. "You will want me, Grace! You must not go from me!"

"Stop! stop!" she commanded, drawing her small, but exquisitely-moulded figure to its full height. "You are presuming, Mr. Branscombe! You appear to be suffering under the illusion that you are the only pebble on the beach!"

To anyone possessing full knowledge of the circumstances, that speech would have sounded unkind, to say the least; but Grace did not understand, so it was justifiable. To John Branscombe it was a just rebuke for his presumption; he recognised that his emotion had carried him too far. He flushed with shame.

"I beg your pardon!" he said humbly. "I ought to have remembered! Yes, there are others! But—oh, Grace! —they will not love you more than I do!"

He shut his teeth hard in an endeavour to repress the signs of emotion, but without avail. To hide the tears that welled to his eyes, this strong man turned hurriedly, with a farewell wave of his hand, and left the room. Grace caught sight of his face for a second and it banished all resentment from her breast.

"But, really, you know, I am not in love with him!" she remarked apologetically to the walls, and then resolutely shut him from her thoughts.

Mrs. Ashurst would have lived with Grace in London had the state of her health permitted, but the doctor forebade it. She, therefore, took measures to secure the services of an old school friend, and it was in the family of this friend that Grace lived. Thus assured of her daughter's welfare, Mrs. Ashurst made herself contented. She had an income from shares which more than sufficed to keep her and Grace and for the payment of the cost of Grace's musical education.

It was not till she returned for a holiday visit that Grace learnt of the removal of John Branscombe; he had left the place soon after her departure.

"It is said that he has gone abroad," said her mother. "Of course he is possessed of sufficient means to enable him to live a bachelor life without work, so he can reside where he likes."

Grace felt a trifle sorry at the loss of John; it would have been pleasant to see him as a friend; but she soon threw off that feeling.

"It was so foolish of him!" she laughed when she was alone, as she surveyed herself in the mirror. "It served him right that I should tell him that he was not the only pebble on the beach! Yet—he was not a bad sort!"

Then her mind reverted to one or two handsome men who had already paid her marked attention, and her vanity was gratified.

"I shouldn't think of marriage for a long time!" she declared, shaking her head slowly at her own reflection. "I want to make a name, and then—then I can have my choice! It would be nice to have a title!"

She went back to her studies. A year passed away, and Grace heard from her mother a story that showed how nearly she had lost the chance of continuing her education.

"The company in which I was so largely interested," explained Mrs. Ashurst, "failed irretrievably. I was almost killed by the announcement! But Fortune favoured me this time. It seems that my solicitors had guessed something of the kind and had exchanged my shares some time ago. Consequently the failure did not affect us to any extent, and the dividends come as usual; not quite so much, but enough for all purposes!"

"How fortunate!" cried Grace, the colour returning to the cheeks which had blanched at Mrs. Ashurst's first words.

"Exceedingly!" exclaimed her mother in a tone which indicated great thankfulness. "I wrote to express my gratitude, but they said they were pleased to have helped a client and that I had better not say anything about it. I don't quite understand shares and all that sort of thing, so I gave up the attempt to explain to myself how they had managed it."

"I suppose it is all right?" queried Grace, in a wavering tone. "I suppose they hadn't sold the shares long ago and are just paying you the dividend till they abscond or something like that?"

"Oh, no!" Mrs. Ashurst was very decisive. "I would not think of such a thing for a single instant! Mr. Dane owed your father a debt of gratitude, and he is as honest as the day!"

"Have you heard anything of Mr. Branscombe?" asked Grace, a little later. The return to home always awakened the memory of John.

"Nothing whatever!" said Mrs. Ashurst. "He has disappeared completely. In the Colonies, I expect!"

That was rather vague, but Grace accepted it without question. Perhaps he was married? Grace started and frowned as the thought flashed across her mind. Yes, perhaps he was married—why not?

"If so," murmured Grace, "he is probably saying about me what I said to him! He has discovered another pebble!"

It was no concern of hers, but she did not find the reflection very pleasant. It is so natural to want things all one's own way!

The next four years were busy ones for Grace Ashurst; she had developed a magnificent voice, and, at the end of that period, she had made her first public appearance at a small concert with great success.

Her fame spread, people wanted to hear her. Everybody, that is, everybody who cared for music, desired to hear this young singer who promised to rival Patti and glorify Great Britain by the fact that a native-born woman had arisen to assume a place and take the laurels that have so often fallen to natives of other countries!

She appeared in the Metropolis and carried the great city by storm. Newspaper critics were unanimous in their praises; her success was assured. Engagements poured in upon her, all Society was at her feet. Grace Ashurst's triumph was complete!

It was not long before rumours of offers of marriage from possessors of proud titles, and prospective possessors of such titles, were circulated. It is small wonder that Grace felt elated; the stream of success and the halo of the fame were sufficient to produce exultation in one much older than this beautiful woman with the glorious voice!

Grace Ashurst was preparing for a great night, and at its conclusion she was to be the guest, at supper, of a wealthy gentleman, well known for his love of music. It was to be a select gathering; the host and his wife and daughters, with Viscount Critton and a few more chosen members of Society.

The supper was, in point of fact, due to the request of the Viscount, who had induced his friend, the host, to invite the new singer in order that he (the Viscount), might have the quiet opportunity he desired.

The host knew quite well that there would be a proposal of marriage, and Grace herself anticipated it instinctively. She knew but little of the Viscount, but she was prepossessed in his favour and he bore a good reputation. The title had its glamour for her, but she had retained sufficient mastery of herself not to be led away merely by a name.

"I like him!" she told herself. "Love will come afterwards! I do not know that there is anyone whom I like better!"

It was natural that her thoughts should revert to John Branscombe, but it was so long since she had heard of him that the memory of his sterling qualities was dimmed

"I might really have fallen in love with him if he had been more—more dashing, just a little more!" she said meditatively. "He was rather humdrum! He might have been more polished if he had moved in Society. But that's all over now!"

And again her thoughts turned to the Viscount.

Almost at the very moment that Grace was thus communing with herself, the object of that communion was having a heated discussion with Mr. Dane, the solicitor.

"My dear man!" expostulated the solicitor testily. "I cannot keep the farce on any longer! It was perfectly understood between us that the money would secure an annuity for just so long. The time is up and the object is attained. Now the truth must be told! The next payment is due and there is no money forthcoming! The farce about the dividends really ended, or ought to have ended, six months ago! It is hardly fair to her to allow her to think that all is well, right down to the last moment!"

"I know it is not!" said Branscombe moodily. "But it must be kept up for a few days, and by that time an engagement will be announced and Grace Ashurst will be settled! You must keep it up, Mr. Dane, out of friendship for me and Mrs. Ashurst!"

Mr. Dane groaned.

"I consider that I have forfeited my reputation by agreeing to this thing, and that is rather a large price to pay for friendship, young man!" he returned. "No! I must tell her! Grace is able to earn a large sum now, and her personal circumstances will make no difference to Viscount Critton, if he is the chosen man!"

"It might make a difference if he knew!" said Branscombe. "Well, if you must tell, you must keep names quiet for the present! So much is certain! Don't tell her for two days," he pleaded.

"I shall tell her to-morrow!" retorted Mr. Dane decisively.

"Then you will not mention my name yet? That much you must promise, and I insist! What difference will that make? Well, it might upset the prospective wedding and I don't want to do that! Oh, I can't explain how!"

Either Mr. Dane could not or would not see the drift of Branscombe's reasoning; at any rate, his face remained somewhat wooden in aspect.

"I'm going to see her to-night for the last time!" said John Branscombe, as he made his way to the railway station. "My work during the past four years as a journalist will serve me in good stead. I can get at the side and watch her at close range. I cannot take a seat in front, as I have done before. I am too far off, and if I get near—in the stalls—she will recognise me. A last look at the woman I love and then away from this country for good! She will be happy, and what more ought I to want? I desire her happiness! I should like to share it, but if the Fates forbid?"

As Grace Ashurst stood before the enthusiastic audience that evening, she did not dream that John Branscombe stood so near her, feasting his eyes upon her, drinking in the last drops of happiness and striving to banish the dull pain at his heart!

She was compelled to respond to a rapturous encore. She was holding the large audience entranced by her pathetic rendering of an old Scottish air, when something terrorised the entire mass of men and women. From the flies there came a burning mass of flimsy material, falling directly over the singer! It would envelop her in its fiery embrace, the awful consequences of which flashed into the minds of all and held them paralysed!

Grace, carried away by her desire to exceed all her previous efforts, did not notice the look that appeared in the faces of those in front of her, and she stood there with the burning mass falling upon her without being in the least conscious of the terrible fate that threatened her. It was all so momentary that no one could call out.

There was one person who saw the danger and was cool and quick enough to act; it was John Branscombe. He darted forward from the side and pushed Grace towards a side box with a suddenness that sent her reeling. Before she could recover from her amazement, the house was in an uproar.

John had saved her from a dreadful catastrophe; for, had the blazing mass enveloped her, the soft material of her dress would have caught and she would have been doomed; but in saving her, he had brought disaster upon himself. The flaming mass fell upon him before he could get out of line; it covered him and, notwithstanding his endeavours to free himself, it burnt him and caught portions of his clothing.

Assistance was promptly forthcoming; three or four men from the wings rushed on the stage and helped him. In the auditorium a panic ensued, but happily it was quieted before anyone suffered serious injury.

A doctor was called and he ordered the removal of the now unconscious Branscombe to a hospital; but Grace, who had recovered from the shock, insisted that the unfortunate man should be taken to the house of the family with whom she still resided. "He saved me," she said simply, "and I will do my best for him!"

It was not till the following morning, when she was permitted to see the patient, that she recognised John Branscombe, somewhat changed but John all the same.

"John!" she exclaimed involuntarily. "It was you?"

"Yes!" he said. He could not venture to utter more; he averted his eyes lest she should see the love that would come into them.

He was not badly injured; his hands were burnt, his hair and beard were gone, and there was a burn on his right cheek.

"I am a pretty object for her to gaze upon!" he thought. Yet he exulted in it. He had saved her!

"I owe you my life, John!" she said with quivering lips, placing her soft hand on his left cheek.

"Oh, no! Not so bad as that!" he responded cheerfully. "I chanced to be in the way, you see!"

"How was it that you were so near?"

"I wished to see you for the last time!" he replied, with averted eyes.

Then the doctor came in and stopped the conversation; the patient was becoming excited, he said.

Later in the day, Mrs. Ashurst arrived in a state of great nervous strain. Mr. Dane had told her about the dividends and she had heard of the affair of the previous evening.

Her outpouring was so incoherent that Grace could not grasp it at first, but the elder lady grew calmer when she was quite assured that her daughter was safe, and told the other story more plainly.

"So it comes to this. That you really lost all in that failure after all, mother, and that John Branscombe gave all he had to buy you an allowance that would last long enough to enable me to complete my education, and he persuaded Mr. Dane to help him! He wanted to keep his name secret still, but Mr. Dane has told you all. Is that it?"

"Exactly, my dear! And now you must help me to repay him. He has given up all and worked, so that you might not suffer; you must now work to help him and repay him!"

"I will try to repay him, mother, if he will let me! It was he who saved me last night!"

Grace said nothing to John till he was well enough to get about; then she went up to him and held out her hands.

"I know all!" she said. "What can I do to repay you?"

John trembled; he could not reply for a moment; then he said, with a sigh:

"I could tell you!" he cried, "if I—if I were not so painfully conscious that I am only one insignificant pebble among so many better!"

"Don't!" she cried, her eyes filling with tears, her cheeks crimson. "I am sorry that I ever said that! I did not understand!"

He stared at her, doubted if he heard and saw aright; but he could not mistake. He strode towards her and clasped her to his breast.

"Do you mean that, Grace?" he asked fiercely.

"Yes, John! I know now that, for me, you are the only pebble!"

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Below you will find twelve sets of letters, each of which contains the name of a Railway Station in the United Kingdom (not necessarily using all the letters). You must write (in ink), in the space left for that purpose, the longest name you can make by rearranging the letters.

The name containing the greatest number of letters will be the correct solution. If, however, more than one such name can be made out of one set of letters, each will be counted correct.

All the names will be found in the Index to Railway Stations in the January (1903) edition of Bradshaw's Guide. Should you be unable to obtain a copy of this Guide, a reprint of the Index will be sent to you for three penny stamps on application to BRADSHAW'S GUIDE, 59 Fleet Street, London, E.C.; or ROOM EIGHT, "SHORT STORIES," 17 and 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

The first prize of £25 will be given to the competitor who fills in the greatest number of railway stations under the conditions stated. The second prize of £10 will go to the person who fills in the next greatest number, and the other prizes will be awarded in order of merit.

When you have filled in all the names you can find, take out this page and keep it by you. Don't on any account send it to us until the closing date is announced in "SHORT STORIES."

In the event of a tie a further set (or, if necessary, several further sets) of letters will be submitted to the tieing competitors until one wins the first prize outright.

THE WEDMORE'S "HOP."

A Tale of a Misunderstanding which was Cleared up.

"My dear, they are as good as engaged; they always were together even before Gertie was in her teens; and two years ago, when she was sixteen, there was a tremendous row. Miss Fox, in her usual amiable way, congratulated both Colonel Moray and Mrs. Clive on the engagement.

"Of course the result was astonishment, indignation, Percy and Gertie called up to judgment, vows of eternal constancy, Gertie sent to school for six months; and ever since then, whenever Harry has been over here, six 'rounds' together at every hop, and all the squares sat out in the garden, whether Mrs. Clive liked it or not. I suppose, now Percy has this money left to him, it will be all right."

So spoke Miss May Faulkner, a Jersey belle, aged twenty, to her companion, Clare Grattan, a girl two years her senior, who had come from England on a visit to the Clives above-mentioned.

The girls were strolling slowly along the St. Helier's broad white sands; they were lagging rather behind the rest of their party, which had split itself up into two other couples.

Clare Grattan's heart was heavy with a dull oppression of pain, the result of a fear become a reality, as she answered:

"Then you think Mr. Moray"—there was a momentary pause before she spoke this name—"and Gertie care for one another?"

"Think so? Look there!"

As May spoke, she pointed to the figures of a young girl and man who were standing almost at the water's edge, their outlines sharply defined against the sunset glow. Their faces were turned towards the sea, away from Clare; but she, looking at the young man's bent head, the girl's upturned one, could fancy only too well the look of Percival Moray's brown eyes. Had she not known it to her own cost?

She had been a fool, she thought, and only that afternoon had been happy in her folly. Clare Grattan had only been six weeks at Jersey, but that time had been fuller and more intense to her than all the years of her yet early womanhood; she had learnt that her own heart at length had grown into love. For the last month she had found herself, whenever she was at a dance, waiting with a feverish impatience for the advent of a tall, slight figure with a bright, honest face, the charm of which it was difficult to analyse, but impossible not to feel.

She had listened every morning, as she sat in the breakfast-room with Gertie, for a cheerful voice calling them from the garden below, and begging them to come out for a practice at lawn-tennis; and she had felt a new, intense pleasure in the rare talks, in which Percival seemed to show her glimpses of that other "soul side" which a man "keeps to show a woman when he loves her." He suited her as no one else had ever done, and she had fancied that he wished to let her know that he loved her.

And yet she had feared sometimes—and, as it had proved, had had reasons for her fears—that Gertie and Percival had loved one another; and how, thought Clare now, could any girl who had once cared for Percival Moray become indifferent to him?

Clare was still pondering, when Gertie turned her steps towards her friends.

"Do you know it is nearly seven o'clock, Clare? We shall have a nice scolding from mamma if we are late for dinner, and we promised to be at the Wedmores' by a quarter to nine."

Clare smiled faintly.

"How horribly fagged you do look! Not at all like dancing. These last three nights have been too much for you."

"Are you tired?" asked Percy of Miss Grattan, bending towards her.

If he had only known the sharp thrill of pain the tone of his voice caused her! She was glad to hear her own sound unconstrained as she answered:

"Not at all, thank you."

"We have come too far along the sands; I ought to have remembered. Won't you take my arm?"

"Oh, no; I am all right."

He said no more, but, turning again to Gertie, called out to two other individuals who had apparently forgotten everything else in the contemplation of a dead star-fish; at all events, they had been gazing at it for full five minutes, when Percy's voice reached them.

"Hullo, Rashton! Come on, it's getting late."

Thus addressed, the two defaulters moved slowly towards the rest of the little group. Their conversation, as they strolled along, was after this wise:

"Be a brick, Miss Wedmore, and try to give a miserable wretch a chance."

"How can I? I can't make Gertie like you."

"Keep that fellow Moray out of the way, so that I may try my luck at least."

"You're doing your very best to ruin it by seeming to flirt with me. Gertie is awfully jealous, mind."

"Hang it! I beg your pardon, I mean——"

"You needn't, I don't mind it."

"I think I have most reason for jealousy. Why, I know that she and Moray were spoons once, even if they are not now."

"Yes, but Gertie can't know that I am only playing confidante."

"Never you mind; only help me, and you shall see what the bridesmaids' lockets will be like."

"For shame, Captain Rashton! bribery and corruption. By the way, I have a weakness for opals."

"I'll make a note of that," answered Captain Rashton, taking out his pocket-book for the purpose.

Certainly, to an uninitiated eye, the two had decidedly as much the appearance of flirting as Percival and Gertie had, and a keen observer might have connected that fact with the wrathful flash of Miss Clive's blue eyes, and her sharp, petulant answers when addressed.

Clare did not do so, but imagined that these signs of ill-temper in her friend were owing to some fault of Percy, and inwardly determined, now that she knew of the understanding between Mr. Moray and Gertie, to abstain even from any appearance of intimacy with the former, lest it should wound her friend, whom she knew was a little inclined to be exacting.

"She needn't be afraid, though," thought poor Clare to herself. "I know he is true. If he loved me, I would trust him entirely."

The party broke up at the top of King Street, Florence Wedmore going one way, and the three other girls in the opposite direction.

"Good-bye for an hour and a half," said Florence. "Captain Rashton and Percy, you are to come back home with me and give the floors a last polish."

If Gertie's face could be said to be dark at any time, it certainly was, as she with Clare and May turned towards that quarter of St. Helier's popularly known as "the Shingles."

"What a flirt Florence is!" she remarked, with virtuous indignation.

"'People who live in glass houses,'" answered May. "The idea of you accusing anyone of flirting, Gertie, is rather too fine, considering the way you have always treated Percy."

"Percy and I understand one another," answered Gertie curtly.

"That is a comfort, at all events," retorted May, "for nobody else does. Well, here is our house, so ta-ta for the present."

Two minutes more, and Clare and Gertie reached the latter's home, called the Retreat, apparently because it faced the road.

The dinner that evening at the above-mentioned abode was not very cheerful. Gertie was cross, Clare occupied by her bitter thoughts of what she had learnt that afternoon, and Mrs. Clive, Gertie's mother (Miss Clive was an only child), found it very hard work to maintain anything like conversation.

Directly it was ended Gertie ran up to her room to dress for that evening's dance at the Wedmores'. She was standing in her white wrapper by the toilet-table unfastening the twisted rope of her pretty hair, which shone like gold in the still lingering afterlight, when her eye fell on a half-withered bouquet of passion-flower, ferns, and tuberoses, which was placed in a glass of water on the table.

Some memory connected with it made her cheeks flush, her brain throb, her eyes burn with stinging tears, which she tried to force back by hard biting of her underlip.

"So," she thought, "he neglects me and flirts with Florence! Very well, sir, tit for tat. I'll revenge myself with Percy, and if I don't make you suffer—that's all!"

Meanwhile Clare, in her room above, was trying to convince herself against her heart's assurance that Percy did not love her, and that if he did (illogical but girlish sequence), it was her duty to Gertie to reject his affection, and bid him render it to her to whom it was due.

She would be loyal to her friend at all costs to herself.

A light tap at the door, and Gertie entered, looking very pretty in a soft white silk much smothered with lace.

"How shall I do, Clare?"

"I never saw you look so well," said Miss Grattan, and she spoke the truth. Gertie's eyes were shining like bits of sunlit summer sea; her cheeks were a delicate crimson, her fair hair was ruffled in that sweet order of disorder which best suits a Greuze face and low white brow.

"Will you put in my flowers?" said Gertie, holding up the great pink bells of the belladonna lily for Clare to fasten in her hair.

"Thank you, dear," as it was accomplished, and the little lady pirouetted round, humming a waltz in a manner which caused Clare to exclaim:

"Gertie, are you bewitched? What is the matter with you?"

"Nothing," said Gertie, then with a sudden faltering of her voice and a burst of tears, "Oh, Clare, I am so unhappy!"

Clare put her arms round her and let her sob for a few moments in silence, then she spoke:

"I am very sorry; but, Gertie, you needn't be afraid; I am sure he cares for you." Her words were very brave, and her lips did not tremble as she spoke.

"Look there," and as May spoke she pointed to two figures standing at the water's edge.

"Do you think so?" and Gertie lifted her head from where it had rested on her friend's breast. "But why does he flirt so? I am proud, and don't show it, but it pains me dreadfully, Clare. I feel sometimes as if— Oh, why should he hurt me when I love him?"

"Is she trying not to ask me to flirt with him?" thought Gertie's friend, and the hot glow of a wounded pride, far deeper and stronger than that of the younger girl, burnt her pale cheek at the idea that she, Clare Grattan, should be suspected of flirting. It was some little time before she slowly answered:

"I should trust him and be sure he deserves it; and, Gertie"—she spoke nervously and as if frightened lest her friend should be offended—"I wouldn't give him any cause for jealousy by being too much to-night with——"

"There's the carriage," said Gertie, springing up. "I'm very sorry, dear, I can't take your advice, as it's the exact opposite to what I mean to do. I shall treat him just as he treats me."

With which words Miss Clive ran downstairs, and Clare had no opportunity for saying more.

"How good of you to be early!" exclaimed Florence Wedmore, entering the cloak-room as Clare and Gertie were disencumbering themselves of their wraps. "I've put you down to play two waltzes, Gertie, and Miss Grattan for one."

"Oh, I will play as often as you like," said Clare. "I am rather tired, and don't want to dance much."

Florence shook her head.

"I won't victimise you," she said. "Ah, there's the first waltz beginning. I put down Miss Fox for that; she always plays the Faust, and thumps so. It's as well to get her performance over before many people come."

Clare sat down at the piano. She was dressed in a simply-made dress, unflounced and untortured by fashion, of soft silk, the colour of the outer leaves of the daffodil, which deepened in the folds of the drapery, with subtle gradations of shade.

In her black hair were set two or three stephanotis stars; the outline of her face was calm and fair—Percy—who had eyes for her alone—thought sad. The heavy-lidded grey eyes were not fixed on her music; her hands moved mechanically.

How different she was from other women! How unlike her dress, her face, her words, to anything he had ever known! He was twenty-seven, and he loved her, loved her, loved her—the words formed themselves to the rhythm of the passionate German waltz she was playing. He wished that he and she were waltzing to it. Anyhow, he would do the next best thing—ask her for the following dance.

Alas, before he could move to her, the waltz ended. Clare was monopolised by another man, to whom Florence introduced her; and Harry himself was discovered by Miss Wedmore, who insisted on introducing him to a red-haired heiress, who smiled sweetly, as she hoped Mr. Moray did not mind dancing polka time—she did not dance anything else.

Percival Moray was a lieutenant of Hussars, whose father lived in Jersey. The boy himself, when a child, became a favourite with his mother's brother, who proclaimed him as his heir, petted him as a child, sent him to Eton, bought him his commission, only asking in return that he should spend half his holidays and leaves with him; and who had died a twelvemonth ago, leaving Percy two thousand a year, and a pretty old house in Kent.

So two months before this evening Moray sold out and came over to Jersey to win his old love; when, to his great disgust, he discovered that he no longer cared for her, nor she for him. Still they went on playing at love till Clare Grattan came on a visit to the Clives, and Percy fell honestly and heartily in love with her.

Nevertheless, he felt he was, in a manner, bound to marry Gertie if she wished it—and it was hardly likely, he thought, that she did not; for the girl was full of wounded pride and indignation against the man she loved, and held the sweet jest up by dancing, talking, and flirting with Percy so desperately, that she deceived both him and Captain Rashton into the idea that she was in love with the former.

It was fully half an hour before Percy was able to gain Clare's side and ask for "the dance you promised me."

She knew it would be far more marked if she refused, so took his arm as the first bars of the waltz sounded.

Clare was fond of waltzing, and Percy's long swinging, yet perfectly smooth, step suited her better than any other. She could not help enjoying the swift motion.

The last slow chords sounded, and they stopped.

"Ah," said Percy, drawing a long breath, "it's warm."

"It is," assented Clare.

"But the garden is cool," said Percy.

"So people seem to think," she answered, laughing.

For everyone had poured out from the ballroom to the cool night air, and white dresses glimmered dimly among the trees on the small lawn.

"They have placed the refreshment table out there," said the young man. "Don't you want some claret-cup?"

The want was supplied, and they sat down on a rustic seat near the table. The lawn seemed nearly as full as the dancing-room had been a few minutes before; and Clare watched Gertie, as she saw her evidently engaged in a furious flirtation with a man whom she knew Percy disliked.

"She must do it to vex him," Clare thought, quite ignorant that Gertie had not once thought of Mr. Moray this evening.

From the verandah sounded the warning bars of a galop, and the lawn began to be deserted. Clare would have risen, but Percy stopped her.

"Don't go yet," he said; "at least, if you are not engaged for this."

"But I am."

"Then let your partner find you."

"No, I really must go. I want——"

"Oh, I know what you want—to avoid me."

"Mr. Moray!"

"I beg your pardon if I am rude; but how have I offended you?"

"You have not."

"Then why do you always try to escape speaking to me? What have I done?"

"Nothing. I——"

"Why do you stop? Oh, Clare, Clare! don't you know that I love you?"

There was silence. For one moment a great pulse of joy throbbed through the girl's whole being; and then came the sickening remembrance of Gertie.

"You must know it," the young man said passionately. "You must have seen! And I thought—Clare, can't you love me?"

There was no one else near to hear the heavily-whispered "No."

"Then what made me think? for I did think—Clare, you are not a flirt like these girls here. Why were you so kind if you never meant to have me? Why did you let me imagine it?"

She could only say, "I beg your pardon," humbly.

"Why should you? Only look straight at me and say, 'I do not love you,' and I will leave you; but not till then."

She could not tell that lie to him who trusted her; as yet she did not wish to betray her real reason and Gertie's pride.

"You don't speak; you do care for me! I knew it, my Clare!"

He would have taken her hand; but she withdrew it.

"How about Gertie?" she said quietly. "Are you not engaged?"

He did not answer for a moment; then said:

"Is that childish bond to stand between you and me? Clare, Gertie and I are nothing to each other now; we have outgrown our fancy long ago."

"You may have; she has not. Percy, if I trust you with her heart secret, respect it. She loves you, and all her gaiety is put on to hide her pain at your neglect. Oh, think how base I must feel—her friend whom she trusted—to let you speak so to me!"

"You base! You, Clare darling! I've been a thoughtless brute; and I see it now. Forgive me!"

"Yes."

"And love me?"

He spoke timidly, as knowing he would be denied. Her answer came very low.

"I shall have to learn not to do so."

"Then you do?" he said quickly.

"I cannot help it;" and there was the break of a sob in her voice.

"And you ask me to give you up, knowing that? To win my Heaven on earth, and turn away from it? Clare, you cannot."

"I must;" and the bitter agony of the tone only showed the firmness of her resolve. "Percy, you are honourable; don't make me despise you, as I should if you were false to Gertie."

"But, Clare, I love you, not Gertie."

"She loves you," Clare answered, with the sublime unreasonableness of a woman. "And right is right, though it is hard—Oh, so hard!"

"It is something to hear you say that it is hard," he answered, in a smothered tone. "But you don't know how cruel you are to me, or how you have grown into my life. I never meant to love; but this evening when I saw you I felt I must speak and know if you——"

She laid her hand on his.

"And you have made it all the harder for me," he said. "If I had still thought you did not care for me, I might have turned to Gertie; but now——"

"You will do what is right," she answered, while the tears would spring to her eyes.

"Right! Is it right to marry a girl I do not love?"

"You will learn to do so; she is so sweet, you cannot help it."

"Cannot I? Clare, your face is the one face for me on earth; you the one woman."

She rose, blindly, nobly wrong in her self-denial.

"I cannot listen to more," she said, in a choked voice; to her own heart she added, "I dare not."

"Clare!" He rose and caught her wrists. There was no one to see; the garden was again dark and silent, except where the light streamed through the verandah. "I only want to say good-bye."

"What do you mean?"

"Do you think I could go on as I am doing now—see you for the next month every day, and know that you love me, and that you will never be more to me than now? It would drive me mad. No; I shall leave here by to-morrow's boat."

"But, Percy——"

"You need not think that," he said, with a sudden fierce burst of anger; "if she and I were alone on this earth, I would never now marry Gertie. You have done her no good—or, rather, no harm. Dear little thing, she deserves a better fate than a husband who does not care for her."

There was a silence; then Percy spoke again, his voice strangely humble and gentle:

"One kiss, Clare, for our good-bye; only one, my dear."

"No," she said; and her tone was both stern and surprised.

He said no more; side by side they returned to the house. Clare's heart was full with the unutterable longing to turn to the man beside her and say, "Stay;" Percy's with a wild turmoil of anger and love. He felt dimly that his love gave him a right over Clare; that her power, "woman-like to weave sweet words," had been exerted wrongly; that her sacrifice was a needless one, which would mar both their lives and for no good.

A hard grasp of her hand, a low spoken good-bye in answer to her whispered "Forgive me," and he was gone.

A hard grasp of her hand, a low spoken good-bye in answer to her whispered "Forgive me!" and he was gone. When would she see him again? Dizzy and faint with dull misery, she sat down in the verandah.

"I think this is our dance?"

The voice woke her up, and she saw standing by her a tall man with a puffy, foolish, good-natured face.

"I am so very tired," she answered; "will you excuse me?"

"Certainly. You look faint, Miss Grattan; may I get you a glass of water?"

"If you will be so kind."

The water did her good; she steadied her nerves, and gazed in through the open window at the dancers. She saw Gertie, glowing and radiant, the prettiest girl in the room, waltzing with Captain Rashton, looking utterly happy, careless and contented.

For one moment Clare felt a bitter anger against this girl, for whose sake she had given up the supreme beauty and joy of life, and who would never know it.

What did Gertie need more than she had at the present moment? Seemingly nothing; and yet Clare remembered the childish tempest of sorrow she had witnessed a few hours ago, and was glad she had been loyal to her friend, even though at so dear a price.

The dance was over. The two girls climbed rather wearily up the bedroom stairs of the Retreat.

"Come in here, Clare," said Gertie, as they reached the latter's door.

Clare's wearied eyes looked piteously at her friend, as her lips repeated for the third time that evening the excuse, "I am so tired."

"Only for a minute, dear." Gertie drew her in, and shut the door, then said: "You were right."

"What do you mean?" asked Clare, stupidly amazed.

"He loves me," said Gertie, pressing her small hands close against the faded pink lilies on her breast; "he always has, and I was only a little fool to think he was flirting with Florence."

"He! Who?"

"Robert—I mean Captain Rashton. Clare, are you ill?"

For Clare's face was white, her eyes closed, the heavily-cut lips closed together.

"No, Gertie; I am quite well. But I don't understand. Don't you love Per—Mr. Moray?"

"Love Percy! I left off doing so more than a year ago. I've quite ceased to care for him. I only used him as a decoy-duck to draw Robert on."

"And in doing so may have unknowingly wrought evil to two people," thought poor Clare.

Percy was to leave Jersey on the morrow; she might never see him again; he might go abroad, and never hear of the real state of things.

But she remembered it was hardly likely that a man possessing both relations and friends in Jersey would not hear very quickly of his old love's engagement to another man; and she wished Gertie happiness very warmly, and was glad in her gladness, staying with her more than half an hour, listening to her diatribes about Captain Rashton.

She was glad to be alone, though, in her own room; alone, free to thank God for the great happiness which yet might be hers.

And was; for less than a fortnight later Clare was standing under the shade of a tall, flowering myrtle, the aromatic scent of which filled the autumn air with bitter sweetness. Percy was by her, very gravely contented, and on her left hand was the shimmer of a sapphire ring she had only worn a week.

"You came back very quickly," she said. "Were you afraid I should forget you?"

"I wanted to be sure," he answered.

"You needn't have been afraid," and her face glowed a little. "Percy?"

"Clare?"

"Do you know I almost think I was in the wrong that night."

"I am sure you were."

She laughed, but her tone was grave as she said:

"Are you angry with me?"

"Angry with you for showing how strong you were to do what seemed right to you? You must think me a brute, Clare!"

"It seemed to tear my heart out to have to deny you; and I see I was wrong now."

"So do I; but I am not sorry for it, Clare, for it taught me"—he drew her closer to him as he spoke—"how far above myself is the woman I love. T. P. C. Redford.

CHANGING THE PLOT.

Telling of an Editor, a Writer, and a Story.

The publisher of fiction in paper covers was not feeling very amiable when the young lady novelist called on him.

"I called to see about my story," said the young lady novelist.

"Oh, the one which is entitled 'Marietta's Marriage; or, a Life Story from a Book of Cigarette Papers.'"

"Yes, that's it."

"Well, it's a pretty good novel. But you must bear in mind that as litterateurs we're responsible for the education of the public to a certain degree. We must not be too improbable. Sometimes you have to be a little improbable now and then in order to fascinate your reader, but you can be reasonable a good deal of the time."

"But if you try that, isn't your reader likely to become unfascinated?" she inquired.

"Not if you're judicious. Now, the only objection I have to your story is the incident which represents the heroine as jumping out of a third storey window on to an awning over a butcher's shop in order to escape the abductors who are on her track. It's too much to risk on an awning.

"And besides, it's more than likely any abductor who knew his business would have a confederate posted outside to catch her when she bounced off. Of course, you've got her cornered, and she's got to get away somehow. But I must say it doesn't sound quite artistic to me."

She had been thinking while he talked, and she remarked:

"Suppose we arrange it this way: She was on her way home from the milliner's, where she bought the most fashionable hat in the window. She was walking through the park when she saw her pursuers on her track.

"Without a moment's hesitation she took off the hat, laid it on the ground, and then crouched behind the bunch of mammoth hyacinth blossoms which the milliner had told her would cost two guineas extra. How she rejoiced that she had not carried out her threat to go without, rather than pay so much.

"The men who had so often abducted her before were foiled at last. They came within a few feet of her hiding-place, and one of them paused, but only to remark that he had never before seen a flower-bed and shrubbery in that part of the park. Marietta was saved!"

And the publisher nodded his head approvingly, and exclaimed:

"Now, there's some sense in that. If you make the alteration I will take the story and it ought to have a splendid sale."

The final list in the Buried Names of Railway Stations competition will be found on the next page. All attempts must reach this office not later than first post on Thursday, June 18th, addressed to the Editor, Short Stories, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., and marked Buried Stations in the top, left-hand corner.

On page 751 is the second list of "Jumbled Letters" in the new competition, which is sure to take every one's fancy. The re-arranging of the letters will be found to be a most fascinating pastime, and it is one that can be done whenever you have odd moments.

Our new serial story, "The Bond Between," continues to sustain the full interest of readers, and to arouse their curiosity as to what developments will take place as the story goes on. Of course it would only spoil the story were I to tell you now what will happen, but I am sure you will not be disappointed in any way. I hope that all of you who are reading and enjoying "The Bond Between" will recommend your friends to start it now. The summary on the first page will tell them all that is necessary for them to know regarding the chapters that have already been published.

Here is a capital way of helping the Fresh Air Fund. Those readers who have entered the competition which closes on June 18th cannot do better than inclose with their attempts a few stamps for that worthy object—of course those who prefer to inclose a postal order are quite at liberty to do so. A few stamps, however, no one would miss, but yet, when all those received are put together it would mean a day in the country for many little slum children.

It only takes ninepence to give one child a happy day, so if three people each send threepence that means happiness assured for one child. Non-competitors are also asked to contribute what they can—the more the better, and the sooner it is sent the easier it will be to arrange the excursions. All amounts should be sent to the Hon. Sec., Fresh Air Fund, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., and they will be acknowledged in Pearson's Weekly. Collecting forms can be had on application.

BRAND NEW COMPETITION.

Closing Date June 18th.

Cash Down. Cash Down. Cash Down.

1st Prize, £50. 2nd Prize, £25. 3rd Prize, £10.

And 25 Gramophones.

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Below will be found six paragraphs containing the buried names of Railway Stations in the United Kingdom (or words that sound the same as the names). You must write in the spaces given the names of the Railway Stations so indicated.

No word or part of a word may be used more than once in making up the name of a Railway Station. In the event of the name of a Railway Station occurring more than once in a sentence, it should be underlined and written down each time. In case of more than one person finding the same number of words for each or any sentence, those words containing the largest number of letters will have preference. No name of a Railway Station may be composed of a single letter, either standing by itself or taken from any word in the sentences.

When you have discovered the names of Railway Stations in the sentences, underline (in ink) the words which go to make up the names (or words that sound the same as the names) and then on the line underneath each sentence write (in ink) the correct names of the Railway Stations to be found in each.

All the names will be found in the Index to Railway Stations in the January edition of Bradshaw's Guide. Should you be unable to obtain a copy of this Guide, a reprint of the Index will be sent to you for three penny stamps on application to Bradshaw's Guide, 59 Fleet Street, London, E.C.; or Room Eight, SHORT STORIES, 17 and 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

The names of the Railway Stations consist of one word or two or more consecutive words, or consecutive parts of one word, or two or more consecutive words.

The first prize of £50 will be given to the Competitor who fills in the greatest number of railway stations under the conditions stated. The second prize of £25 will go to the person who fills in the next greatest number, and the other prizes will be awarded in the order of merit.

When you have filled in all the names you can find, cut out the list below and fasten it to the other eleven lists. Then put them all in a envelope which you must address to the Editor, SHORT STORIES, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., marking it "Buried Stations" in the top left-hand corner. All attempts must arrive not later than first post on Thursday, June 18th.

In the event of a tie a further list (or, if necessary, several further lists) of sentences will be submitted to the tieing competitors until one wins the first prize outright.

"Horace Stewart!" she cried, starting back and raising her hand as if to ward off a blow.

A Strange Encounter.

Being the fourth of six stories told in the Brighton Express and now related

BY

WINIFRED GRAHAM.

"Foo again!" said Stourbridge. "That reminds me of a story that I shall tell in due course when my turn arrives."

"Take it to-night," said Bremner. "No time like the present."

"Late one afternoon, when London was enveloped in a veil of yellow mist, a strange coincidence occurred. It was just such a fog as this, and even the muffin-man's bell sounded melancholy through the damp air as he bore his tray of sodden muffins up and down the deserted streets. He had the monopoly of the pavement save for an occasional policeman, blinking in the thick atmosphere with watery eyes.

"A thin, black cat, hearing the milkman's cry in an adjoining road, peered out; but the fog was too much even for her, and she as hastily retreated down the area. The lighted lamps glimmered faintly, becoming momentarily more indistinct. Darkness hung over the City like a pall; all seemed lifeless, silent, ghost-like.

"Barbara was groping for some railings, white with sudden dread, as she drew her long cloak closer round her and pressed her little cold cheek against her muff. The fog had overtaken her, and, after wandering about for over an hour, hopelessly confused, she began to think it would never lift.

"'I have lost my way. I am frightened!' she murmured, contemplating the now orange-coloured gloom.

"A dark figure loomed suddenly in the stifling vapour, and a man, also feeling his way by the railings, stumbled against her.

"'What have we here?' he said, half to himself; then, seeing it was a lady, raised his hat apologetically. 'I beg your pardon. I am afraid I startled you.'

"The sound of a human voice reassured Barbara, after the intense loneliness of her wanderings. She had begun to picture the night wearing slowly on, while she still strayed hither and thither, homeless and alone. Thankful to seek help from anyone, she addressed the stranger in a plaintive voice:

"'Can you by any chance tell me where I am?'

"'That is exactly what I want to know myself,' he replied, looking round in vain for some landmark. He was tall and upright, and though Barbara could not see his face his voice encouraged her. It was cheerful, kind, reassuring.

"'I live in Hyde Park Mansions,' she told him. 'Do you think I shall ever find my way there?'

"'Oh! yes. It seems somewhat hopeless for the moment, but I dare say you are not far off. If you will allow me, I'll do my best to put you on your road. There is really nothing for it but to walk on and trust in Providence.'

"'Thank you,' she said simply.

"Slowly they wended their way through the gloom, Barbara feeling slightly shy and embarrassed, but less alarmed than when she had been unprotected.

"'It is really not safe for a lady to be out alone such a day as this,' he declared. 'The darkness is most bewildering.'

"'It came on very suddenly. I was lunching with a friend, and never imagined anything so dreadful happening when I started to walk home. I feel like a blind beggar without a dog.'

"'I hope I am not leading you astray.'

"He paused as they were passing under a lamp. She gazed up at the blurred light as if in her confusion its dim glow could solve the problem of the premature night, and lead her back to surer paths. The yellow rays fell full on her profile.

"The man, with excusable curiosity, scanned the features of his fair companion ; while she, in her distress, never noticed his handsome, flashing eyes, nor the enigmatical expression which contracted his face. He started visibly at the sight of Barbara's troubled countenance, and hurried on, breathing hard, while his heart beat high, and his pulses throbbed. A moment since, and this episode amused him. He had looked on it as rather diverting than otherwise. Now it changed suddenly, with the dim flash of clouded gas light, into a tragedy !

"His hands were clenched, his teeth set. For a while he did not speak. When next he addressed Barbara his voice sounded husky. She thought it was caused by the fog, which made her own throat sore and smarting.

"'Your English climate is most depressing,' he said, trying to speak naturally. 'This atmosphere eats its way as poison into the system, to contaminate our lungs, clog our souls, lower our spirits. It falls like death on the City ; it is Nature's worst bane. I have just returned from India and the contrast is appalling. Perhaps I feel it more than a hardened Londoner, who has lived through the grime and fog, the bitter cold and cutting wind, year after year. I have been spoilt by the sultry heat for wintering in my native land.'

"He shivered. Barbara could hear his teeth chatter. She glanced up quickly, but his features were not easily distinguished.

"'India !' she cried. 'My husband was stationed there. I spent all my married life at Allahabad.'

"'Really,' he replied slowly. 'How strange ! that is where I was.'

"'Then, perhaps, you knew him, and the sad story attached to his death. It caused a great talk at the time, from its intensely sudden and tragic nature.'

"'His name ?'

"'Major Ramsay.'

"'Ah !'

"He heaved a deep sigh.

"'It is familiar to you ?'

"'Yes.'

"'Then you doubtless heard about the murder ?'

"He winced and bit his lip. Barbara spoke calmly. She waited a moment before he answered.

"'Murder ! that is a hard, an unjust word for it. Not even from the lips of his widow should such an expression be breathed.'

"'There were many differences of opinion on the subject, but mine has never wavered for an instant,' answered Mrs. Ramsay, her voice vibrating with sudden passion. 'Nothing is too hard ! I am not speaking at random, and I have had time to weigh the matter carefully in my own mind. I repeat —he was murdered. Perhaps you have never heard the exact details ?' Her eyes flashed as she spoke. She felt the heated glow of indignation course once more through her veins. A scene, far distant, rose before her out of the annals of the past—a sickening vision miraged in the yellow London fog.

"'My husband,' she said, as if speaking half to herself, 'had been suffering from an affection of the heart——'

"'Yes, yes ; I know.'

"'So did everyone, and we were most careful not to excite him. Any sudden agitation, the doctor said, might mean instantaneous death. A man came to our house one night and quarrelled over the card-table. He and my husband were gambling after dinner. I remember how I lay ill and feverish in my room, weakened by malaria, listening to the clink of money and wondering when it would end.

"'I had just fallen asleep when high words aroused me. I knew the terrible danger that threatened Julian should anything seriously disturb him. The tumult increased. I could hear a volley of imprecations from one of the two men, I knew not which, for I was dizzy with fear.

"'Like one in a dream I rushed into the room, only in time to see his adversary rise and strike him a violent blow. Then,' and her voice grew hoarse with horror, 'my husband fell back dead at my feet ! I can remember nothing more, the walls swam round in a sea of blood, the vengeance of Heaven seemed thundering in my ears and I dropped senseless by the body. It was proved that Major Ramsay died from disease of the heart, but the man was his murderer nevertheless.

"'In my spell of unconsciousness I saw Horace Stewart on the gallows, his rightful place. Ah ! I know what you are thinking, that I am vindictive, inhuman, but you were not there, you did not hear and witness the ghastly tragedy, amidst scattered cards and spilt wine.

"'I have never seen the man since, I pray Heaven that I never may. I should not have told you all this, but you spoke of that miserable place, and the very name Allahabad brings the past back so visibly I cannot help talking of it.'

"'The story is familiar to me, for I knew the unfortunate fellow who was with Major Ramsay that night. He is still living, poor chap !'

"'You pity him ?'

"'Yes, and therefore, if possible, I would justify him. Horace Stewart, till he met Major Ramsay (forgive me if I pain you), lived an honest, open life : his conscience clear, his record clean. No slur blackened his past, and there was not, perhaps, a more popular or respected man in the regiment. Your husband initiated him into the mysteries of a gambling den, imbuing him with the dangerous fascinating taste. He was little more than a boy, and the influence of his superior officer took a deep and evil hold upon him.

"'One night Major Ramsay asked him to his private house, and plied him with wine, of which he himself partook freely. After dinner his host suggested cards, and named high stakes. I know for a fact that he refused, but was finally overruled.

"'While they were playing, the Major, for some unaccountable reason, sprang suddenly to his feet, and accused this young subaltern of cheating. Stewart, in his hot-headed youthfulness and indignation, did not realise that the man who had insulted him was not responsible for what he said. He thought only of the vile slur on his honour, and denied it in language that was straight, if not strictly guarded. The Major, frenzied at his daring to reply, seized up a glass, and flung it in Horace Stewart's face, cutting him severely. He bears the marks to this day.'

"'I remember the blood on the man's mouth,' said Barbara shuddering. She hastened her steps, clenching her hands in the warm recesses of her fur muff.

"'Have you anything more to say?'

"'Yes ; hear me out. Maddened with pain and rage, Stewart sprang upon him. What would have happened next Heaven only knows ! Death intervened. Swift and terrible was the judgment that fell upon Major Ramsay and his unfortunate companion, who stood petrified with horror at the sight of that sudden end. He remembers a young and beautiful woman entering the room and flinging herself between them with a cry which he would have given a whole lifetime not to have heard. It haunts him even now, sleeping and waking.

"'The thought of her frightened eyes and livid lips have never left him. "You have killed my husband!" she moaned, wringing her hands, and, though he was not guilty, he felt that the bane of the slayer was on him. He watched them at his feet, side by side—husband and wife—one dead, the other senseless. From that moment his happiness fled. It seemed as if the woman had pronounced his doom; branded him with her terrible condemnation.

"'In spirit he followed the girl-widow from those Indian shores, praying day and night that she might be comforted. The memory of that fatal evening's work dogs his steps. He seeks rest, but finds none. That event has left its mark upon him, and his friends say he has never been the same since. It is remorse that kills. Perhaps you have never known the real meaning of the word? If so, you would pity Horace Stewart—heart and soul.'

"Barbara, absorbed in the conversation, wandered blindly on with her companion, not heeding time or place. The incident that had brought them together was forgotten in a maze of entangled thought. Present and past blended in a yellow blur, like the shadows that came and vanished through the mist.

"'I think I understand,' she said at last.

"'What?'

"'About remorse. It is the most horrible, far-reaching sorrow of all. A pain that stretches like the long fingers of Time to the very brink of eternity. You cannot stamp it out. Revenge is a sin, and I believe I could conquer this longing to injure Horace Stewart if I thought that he had suffered as I have since my loss.

"'It was the knowledge that I despised my own husband—was cold, hard, cruel to him for his faults—which made his death so bitter for me to bear. I might have tried to influence him—to make him better—but, in my disgust, I wrapped myself in a freezing armour of reserve, and not till the opportunity had passed did retribution take the form of life-long agonising remorse. I wonder'—pausing suddenly—'why I tell you this? I have never before breathed the true cause of my grief to anyone.'

"'Then you ought, instead of harbouring revengeful thoughts about Horace Stewart, to feel sorry for him. I know him, Mrs. Ramsay, as thoroughly as myself. We have never been separated. I have suffered with him, the pain has been mine as well.'

"'Then he is in London with you now?'

"'Yes. May I not take back some message, one kind word from the lips of Barbara Ramsay?'

"'Bring him to me,' broke in Barbara sharply. 'I have grown hardened. It may soften me.'

"She slipped off the pavement as her companion guided her to a crossing. The strong support of his arm steadied her, and they groped their way onwards.

"'It is the darkest hour before the dawn,' he murmured. 'There is hope for you and Horace Stewart. You have both suffered, so you will understand each other.'

"'Do you think so?' she replied, half doubtingly. 'Perhaps when I see his face my hate will overcome my pity. I am afraid of my own bad nature breaking out before the man who brought this burden of remorse upon me. What if a sudden sense of repulsion, a swift reaction, deadens the good and quickens the bad that lies dormant, or holds sway, in every being? Then I should call him a murderer——'

"She ceased speaking, arrested by a sense of something about to happen; she knew not what. The fog lifted suddenly, and her eyes fell full upon her companion as the word 'murderer' was on her lips.

"'Horace Stewart!' she cried, starting back, and raising her hands as if to ward off a blow.

"'Yes,' he muttered, with downcast eyes. 'Why did you not guess it from the first?'

"Dazed by this fresh discovery, she drew nearer, as if still doubting her senses, and stared at him fixedly. The shock staggered her! She had conjured up the face so often in connection with all that was most repugnant and horrible.

"'I did not dream for one moment that I had been speaking with you,' she gasped. 'It is an insult to the dead!'

"'Yet a moment ago you bade me bring him to you. Now he is here you turn away.'

"The man spoke pleadingly. He grasped her hand, but she drew it back, trembling with indignation.

"'Don't come near me! Don't touch me! How dare you?'

"Her mood varied in a moment. She felt contaminated by his presence.

"'You cannot pity or forgive? Is it too much to ask? Think calmly of all that we have said. Am I unworthy to implore this thing? There is the one link between us still—remorse, undying! Speak to me, Barbara Ramsay. I beg but two words from your lips—friendship, pardon!'

"'No, no, no!'

"She dashed on through the fog, now descending more heavily.

"He followed closely, afraid to leave her. She seemed to be hastening blindly forward, without sense or reason. Her faculties had become paralysed, numb!

"An array of dark objects loomed in the road, but Barbara did not see them in her headlong career. She only wanted to escape from Horace Stewart and the miserable story of the past.

"Suddenly her flight was arrested. She ran into something big and black—a horse with a flowing mane, which reared his head above her hat.

"Barbara, startled and frightened, slipped upon the road, and fell with a cry in front of the vehicle.

"But Horace Stewart, following closely, already seeing the danger, seized the animal's head with one hand and helped Mrs. Ramsay to her feet with the other.

"'Are you hurt?' he cried anxiously.

"'No, but what is it?'

"She wrung her hands, and he could feel her trembling as he took her arm protectingly.

"'A funeral lost in the fog. But don't give way like this! I am not going to harm you.'

"'No,' she said, 'you saved me.'

"'Where are we, governor?' shouted the hearse driver.

"'I don't know,' he replied, hurrying Barbara by a line of mourning carriages.

"The sight of the burial procession filled her with a sense of solemn horror. Even Stewart's company was acceptable at that moment, despite its sad associations. She wondered if after all she had judged him too harshly. Her courage was slowly ebbing away as the prolonged darkness increased. It seemed enveloping her soul and scattering her wits.

"Horace was quick to perceive her growing alarm and hastened to reassure her.

"'I think I know where I am. Only keep near me, and you shall be home soon, safe in the shelter of Hyde Park Mansions.'

"'You are very good,' she faltered, already regretting her cruel words. The remark, so faintly murmured, quickened the pulsation of his heart, for Barbara's presence held some mystic fascination for him. The haunting memory of her face had clung to him so long, that now, though he could not see her eyes gradually softening, he knew instinctively that her better nature was gaining the upper hand.

"'I wonder,' she said at last, 'how many hours that poor body will be before it reaches its grave?'

"'The fog is lifting again; we are coming to the light.'

"Barbara glanced up, relieved. A smile broke over her face, while a sigh of satisfaction escaped her, as she recognised her surroundings.

"'You have guided me well'—she paused. 'Is it by chance that you have brought me to my very door?'

"'Not exactly. I knew where you lived. I have been acquainted with your movements for some time.'

"'Who tells you about me?'

"'One of your greatest friends, and mine.'

"'A woman?'

"'Yes.'

"'Dora Lyell? She has never mentioned your name to me.'

"'No. It could only have given you pain, and you would not have welcomed any message from Horace Stewart. She is a relation of mine, and we always corresponded—so far away at Allahabad, I treasured each word of news concerning Barbara Ramsay.'

"She turned from him slowly to hide the tears that forced themselves into her eyes, and mounted the steps of the house by which they were standing.

"She surveyed him in silence, as he lingered a moment on the pavement watching her.

"'Will you not say one kind word?' he asked.

"Barbara hesitated.

"In every life there is a crisis, when some decision must be made that will lay an impress on the future, for weal or woe.

"She felt that this man—risen like a sceptre in the gloom—had an influence on her destiny.

"He looked wet and cold, for they had tramped far together. It was drizzling miserably, and she thought of the warm fire within as she pealed the bell.

"He noted her indecision, and, raising his hat, walked away without a word. Her heart melted as his figure vanished in the misty air.

"'Horace Stewart,' she called faintly, 'you may come back!'

"He caught the tearful tone, whispered so low through the heavy atmosphere, that Barbara marvelled at his alertness.

"A moment later they were standing side by side in a cheerfully lighted hall.

"The brightness dazzled him as she led the way to a cosy boudoir, where the gleams from a blazing fire threw grotesque shadows on the silver tea-tray and quaint ornaments.

"Wonderfully homelike and comfortable it looked, after the dreariness without.

"In silence she drew a second chair to the hearth.

"For a while neither of them spoke, each feeling irresistibly the soothing influence of their surroundings.

"'I wish I could understand myself,' she said suddenly, leaning forward, and staring into the fire, with her chin in her hands.

"Stewart grasped his opportunity to awaken her sympathy and confidence. Long they sat together, till the fire dwindled through neglect, speaking such words as drift on between men and women, when Fate brings them together in some new or mysterious way.

"Barbara's eyes were moist when Horace Stewart rose to say good-bye.

"'You shall be my friend always,' she said.

"'Never more than a friend?' he asked, 'through all the years that are to follow?'

"'I am only a woman,' she replied softly; 'you must not tempt me.'

"But, as Barbara turned away, she smiled."

The booming of fog signals on the line broke in, as if applauding the story.

"You have given us a chapter from two lives—illustrated," said Mr. Carter. "The elements are your artists."

(Next week: The Return of the Prodigal.)

"THIS is a forget-me-not," remarked Jawkins, as he looked at the string on his finger, and wondered why his wife had tied it there.

"IN mid-ocean we met a magnificent private yacht flying signals of distress." "Leaking?" "Oh, no; their cook wanted to leave."

MRS. KNAGGS (as her husband comes in late at night): "What does the clock say, John?" Mr. Knaggs (with difficulty): "Nothing, madam, nothing. It's got sense enough to say nothing."

A Village Mystery.

Telling of How a Girl Saved her Lover.

"I TELL you once and for all it is impossible—I would die sooner than my daughter should wed a pauper." The speaker, old Farmer Talbot, was white with rage, and he more than once threateningly raised a heavy hunting-crop he carried.

His companion, a good-looking young fellow of some two and twenty summers, up to this point had kept his temper during a long harangue of which the above was merely the tag, but the last remark proved too much for him.

"Very well, Mr. Talbot, if that is your decision, then listen to mine. I swear that I shall marry Alice very soon, and neither you nor any other man will prevent me. I am poor because circumstances have been against me, but I can work, and as for your money, you insult me by mentioning it. We love one another very dearly, and there's no need to make your miserable wealth a stumbling block between us."

Leonard Chadwick tried to speak calmly, but inwardly he was boiling with indignation.

"Don't you dare give me any of your insolence about what you are going to do," Talbot replied in passionate tones, "for if I catch you speaking to my daughter again I'll—I'll horsewhip you—you fortune-hunting young vagabond!"

He made a sudden movement forward as he spoke, his face convulsed with rage, and, raising the crop he carried, aimed a violent blow at Leonard's head; the latter, stepping back quickly, avoided its full force, but the stick descended heavily on his right hand, causing him to drop the rifle he was carrying to the ground. For a moment he stood irresolute, livid with fury at this attack, then, picking up his weapon, he muttered hoarsely:

"You shall hear more about this, sir. You are her father, and only that fact keeps my hands from you now." With these words he strode rapidly from the spot.

* * * * *

The little village of Cherry Linton was all agog with excitement. Nearly everyone who was somebody, and the majority of those who were not, had turned out to witness the opening of a grand new rifle range.

This was a free gift from Sir Samuel Barnes, who had recently been imbued with the prevalent and laudable notion that every young fellow ought to be able to handle a gun, whether the country were in danger or not. So he accordingly, and entirely at his own expense, turned over a considerable portion of his magnificent estate to the good cause.

The site chosen for this purpose was perfect in every way. Far away from any habitation the targets were placed at the bottom of a lofty hill which formed, Sir Samuel argued, an absolute and natural protection against the possibility of stray shots.

It was a lovely May day as Cherry Linton, wearing its best bib and tucker, laughed and jostled itself into Sir Samuel's grounds. Light refreshments had been provided in a huge marquee, and a band specially engaged discoursed some lively Sousa melodies.

The gentry of the neighbourhood, at Sir Samuel's invitation, threw aside all formality on this occasion and waited on the villagers.

Foremost amongst the helpers was Alice Talbot. Her sunny face, partly hidden beneath a large white hat, was here, there, and everywhere. She not only reflected the sun's rays in her pretty golden curls, but was herself a little ray of sunshine penetrating into the very hearts of all she came in contact with.

Now and then she would place her tray of fruit, lemonade and cakes on the grass and run nimbly to the gate anxiously looking up the high road, in the direction of her own homestead. At last she was rewarded, for presently she espied Leonard coming slowly along the road.

"Why, Leonard, how late you are; and, gracious, how ill you're looking!" she exclaimed in a breath, as he approached.

"Yes, I am late, little one, but there was a reason for it," he said nervously looking back.

"Why, what do you mean, dear?" she asked, placing her hands in his. "And where is father—you said you would bring him on here."

"Well, I haven't, I left him down there," and Leonard pointed rather grimly behind him.

At that moment, before the lovers had time for further conversation, a group of noisy youngsters surrounded them, begging Leonard to come on to the range and open fire with the rest. By this time the fun was in full swing, the popping of corks vainly resounded against the sharp rifle cracks, the hum of bullets as they sped through the air, and the metallic thwack when their further progress was sometimes stopped by their would-be iron destination.

As Leonard with his little following made their way to the firing-point, they were met by Sir Samuel, who exclaimed jovially:

"Ah, my lads, now you must look to your laurels. Here comes young Chadwick with a real live 'Martini-Henry,' I declare!"

Way was instantly made for him, for not only was he very popular in the village, but his prowess with firearms was well known; so great things were expected on his arrival.

To everyone's surprise, however, Leonard handed his rifle to the nearest bystander with a bag of cartridges, saying he was not feeling well and would not shoot.

A murmur of delight went round as one after the other each aspiring sharpshooter during the next twenty minutes blazed away to his heart's content with Leonard's weapon, for the two "Lee-Metfords" provided by Sir Samuel were rapidly exhausting the patience of the many waiting their turn.

Alice was not slow to see that something very much out of the way must have occurred to prevent her lover from indulging in his favourite sport, and she came over and took his arm.

"There is something wrong with my boy," she said, leading him away from the crowd, "and he must tell me all about it this very minute."

"I cannot, Alice—I cannot. You must not ask me. It is true I am upset, and I have barely had time to make my mind up as to what my next step will be. There is one thing, though, dearest, you must prepare for a separation. I shall have to leave you for a time at least."

"Leave me, Leonard?" she asked, a slight pallor overspreading her face. "Leave me—why, what for?"

"Only your father——"

"My father; then you have been speaking to him about me, and high words have passed between you both. I see it all!" she gasped hurriedly. "Oh, my poor Leonard, I am so sorry you should have suffered mental pain on my account. I know exactly what he thinks—the son of a bank clerk is not the husband for me. Never mind, Leonard, be brave; all will come right in the end. Dad is not bad at heart, though he does let his temper get the better of him very often."

"Thanks for your sympathy, dear," Leonard rejoined, moodily looking away from her, "but things have come to a serious pass between your father and me. We shall never speak to each other again. He raised his hand against me, and I——"

"My father dared to do that?" she cried, the warm colour rushing to her cheeks.

Leonard was about to reply when another interruption took place. Sir Samuel Barnes was running towards them calling Alice's name out as he ran.

"Whatever is the matter?" she cried nervously, clutching Leonard's arm. "How startled he looks."

"Quick, child!" said the old knight, as he came up to them. "A man on a bicycle has just arrived to say your father has met with an accident about a mile down the road. Get home, where he is being taken, as soon as possible; they will want all the help they can get."

"Oh, my poor father," she cried, as the revulsion of feeling took possession of her. "Come, Leonard, we must go to him at once," and without another word she sped across the grass in the direction of the gate.

Leonard was about to follow, but Sir Samuel caught his arm and whispered:

"I daren't tell the girl myself, but a ghastly crime has been committed. Farmer Talbot is murdered. He was found shot through the back ten minutes ago. Go now, my boy, and comfort that poor girl as best you may."

Leonard staggered forward a pace or two, then, without a word, broke away from Sir Samuel and hurried off in the direction Alice had taken. She had a good start, however, and as he stumbled up to the gate she was just getting into a governess-cart Sir Samuel had thoughtfully pressed into her service. She waved her hand and disappeared down the road.

As Leonard made his way after her, he had not proceeded far when he became conscious that those who passed looked at him with a certain degree of curiosity, sometimes mixed with awe. A young mother drew her child almost into the hedge with a scream as he rapidly strode by, while further on two lads stopped open-mouthed as they pointed at him.

About half way to Talbot's Farm, Horton, the police sergeant of Cherry Linton, came suddenly round a bend in the road and came face to face with him. Horton looked white, either with exertion or excitement, and he halted in front of young Chadwick.

"Mr. Chadwick, I have painful news for you. It is my duty to arrest you on suspicion of having shot Mr. Talbot."

As Leonard was about to speak, he added quickly—

"For God's sake, sir, say nothing, or whatever is said may be taken in evidence against you. Come quietly with me, and may this shadow pass as quickly as it has descended on you!"

Outside the little rural police station, a crowd of villagers had already assembled, and when Horton with his prisoner was preparing to cross the threshold, a woman, pale as death, broke from amongst their ranks. With eyes glazed with horror, she gave one anguished glance at Horton's prisoner, murmuring—

"Leonard, Leonard, how could you have done this?" She then tottered forward and fell in a dead faint at his feet.

The case as it stood for the prosecution was perfect when Leonard Chadwick was formally committed for trial at the

A Clergyman on Happiness.

"I HAVE lived long enough," says an eminent clergyman and Doctor of Divinity, "to learn that the secret of happiness is never to allow one's energies to stagnate."

It's easy talking, Doctor, but we have to allow some things to happen whether we will or not. When a man hasn't a morsel to eat and can't get food anywhere, he is obliged to "allow" himself to go hungry. And "energies" come from something—are dependent on something. When that something fails then the energies stagnate, in spite of all the doctors in the world—theological or medical. You can't stir up your energies as you stir meal-and-water—with a stick.

Hear a little testimony on that point from a lady residing at Tideford, St. Germans, in Cornwall. Speaking of a personal experience dating back to her girlhood, she says: "I always felt drowsy and exhausted and had no interest or joy in life whatever." In other words, her energies stagnated—a state of things which the clergyman thinks one ought not to allow to happen. Why did it happen? Let the lady herself explain. "I was but a girl when first troubled with indigestion," she writes. "I enjoyed good health up to a certain period, when my appetite declined and the little I ate caused dreadful pain in the chest and brought on palpitation. I was quickly done up and had an unreasonable dread of some impending evil. Such was my condition for months, growing worse day by day until I became so thin and weak that I could hardly get about.

We venture to say our clerical friend never had indigestion as this lady had it, or he would never have talked so glibly about not allowing one's energies to stagnate. In mercy's name how can one help it when indigestion is wringing the life out of one. If one has energy enough to do as did this lady—Miss Eliza Peters—there is cause to be thankful. She acted on the advice of a neighbour, who had been in a like condition, and sent for a bottle of Mother Seigel's Syrup. It took several bottles to cure her, for the indigestion was deep-seated, but cure her it did and so completely that she has never been troubled with it since. Such is her testimony and it may be relied on implicitly.

People who lack energy, feel tired, languid, feeble, nervous ill and unhappy, need one thing to make them strong, bright, vigorous and comfortable again, viz., food.

Food will do it, when everything else has failed entirely. After it is digested it will do it, not before. When your stomach is so deranged that it cannot digest your food, Seigel's Syrup will tone it up and help it to do its work. That is how and why it has brought energy, health and happiness to thousands of tired, dyspeptic men and women, who, without it, to quote our clerical friend, found it impossible "never to allow one's energies to stagnate."

Domestic Friction.

"THE longer I live," writes "A Countess" in the "Outlook," "the more convinced I am that breakfast is the cause of more domestic friction than can be accounted for by mere incompatibility of temper. It is not in human nature," she adds, "to be amiable in the early morning." Why it is so, is easy to understand when we remember that nine people out of every ten suffer from indigestion in one form or other. To awake in the morning fagged and worn out, dull of head and weary of limb, and with a taste in the mouth that makes breakfast a mockery, is certainly not conducive to good temper and geniality. The fault is not with the breakfast but with the stomach that should call for and digest it. Thousands of dyspeptics have proved the power of Mother Seigel's Syrup to cleanse and tone the stomach, liver, and kidneys, sharpen the appetite, assist digestion, even the temper and invigorate the system. Says one of them, Mrs. Holloway, of 3, Church Street, Henley-on-Thames, "I used to suffer such dreadful agony from indigestion. For years my life was a misery. After doctors' treatment had failed, my son's wife made me try Seigel's Syrup and gradually the pain subsided. All the other ailments followed and soon I was as well as ever."

next assizes. Not a single link in the chain of evidence was missing to brand him as the author of the crime.

A witness had sworn on oath that at 11.50 to the minute on the morning of May 13th he had seen from the road the deceased and accused together engaged in what seemed to be a violent altercation just inside the drive leading to Talbot's farm.

Two other important witnesses deposed to seeing from the same position at about 12.15 a prostrate body lying across the drive.

Climbing over the gate, they were shocked to find it was Farmer Talbot himself bleeding profusely from a gunshot wound in the back. Bending over and endeavouring to lend him every aid, they distinctly heard him say, "This is the work of Leonard Chadwick!" Before further assistance could be procured, life had become extinct.

The medical evidence went to show that the fatal injury had been caused by a partly-spent Martini-Henry rifle bullet, which had entered the centre of the back, and finally lodged in the upper regions of the chest. It was impossible for the wound to have been self-inflicted.

There was no direct evidence whatever in connection with the crime. It was purely circumstantial. No one actually saw it commmitted, yet not the slightest doubt existed in anyone's mind that Chadwick was the murderer.

There was the quarrel for the motive, the startling, incriminating admission of the dying man, the poignant fact that Chadwick's was the only rifle of that particular make able to be traced in Cherry Linton.

His pale face and peculiar, nervous manner on his arrival at the range; all were overwhelming testimony to his guilt, and there could hardly be conceived a simpler case to prove than this particular one the Crown had undertaken.

In spite of all, Leonard protested he was absolutely innocent. He pleaded "not guilty," and swore that although he had left Talbot in a frenzy of passion, he had not raised a finger against him.

At first, Alice, numb with horror, as one by one the startling array of convincing proofs were brought like spectres before her, allowed herself to believe her lover had been led away by passion, and committed the act in a moment of madness, but as the days of the earlier investigations dragged along their weary length, she watched the face of her lover as he stood upright in the dock, calm and fearless, and she read the light of truth in his eyes when he said calmly—

"I swear before God and the whole world, I am innocent!"

The day he was committed for trial, she left the Court House, her eyes burning with an unnatural brilliance. She was convinced that he was falsely accused, and thereupon determined to move Heaven and earth itself to prove it.

The fact that she was only a frail woman did not deter her in the least, the enormity of the difficult task had no terror for her. She undertook to unravel, unaided, a mystery that would have taxed the powers of the keenest and most experienced detective.

For two whole days she wandered up and down the route Leonard had traversed on the day of the tragedy, examining every inch of the ground in the dim hope of discovering a clue that would lead to the real truth. But no success attended her efforts.

On the morning of the third day an idea suddenly occurred to her, and her heart began to beat with a new-found hope. To-day was Saturday. It was only a tiny glimmer—a chance in a million of it ever leading to a correct solution, but it became indelibly imprinted in her mind and she would see it through.

She accordingly made her way to the place where her father's body had been found, and, seating herself on a rustic bench in a little alcove abutting on the carriage drive, took up her curious vigil.

Straight in front several fields stretched for two miles, terminating at the richly wooded estate of Sir Samuel Barnes. According to the evidence that had been forthcoming, Leonard, it was suggested, must have fired the shot from some position in these fields, and then walked across to the left, and so regained the road that led directly to the gate where she met him on that fatal day. So that actually the firing point of the new range was to the extreme left of where she was sitting, and the targets far distant to the right.

Straining her ears and labouring under strong mental excitement, she was at last rewarded. She distinctly heard the sound of distant firing. Shooting had commenced at Sir Samuel's, as was usual every Saturday at noon.

Alice left her seat and swiftly ran along the drive fully conscious of the fact that if her idea were correct she was running a great danger, and perhaps her own life would pay the forfeit. Now and then she stopped and bent low over the ground, watching and waiting for a sign. Would it never come?

At last, just as she was beginning to despair, something hissed quite close to her, and crashed into the bark of an oak tree by her side.

With a scream of triumph she flung herself on her hands and knees and closely examined a small hole that had been bored in the tree. She then jumped to her feet, and darted to the other side of the drive, and with staring, anxious eyes, watched the open end of an earthenware irrigation pipe, long since disused.

She had not long to wait ere another metal missile emerged and, ricocheting off the gravelled path, also buried itself with a resounding crash in a tree opposite. This time the mark was breast high.

Here at last was the explanation of the mystery. The dim hope that she had so miraculously conceived developed into a substantial fact—the truth was out!

Farmer Talbot had been killed accidentally by a shot fired from Leonard's rifle by one of the villagers on the day the range was opened, and the bullet, fired wide of the target, curiously enough, was conveyed unobserved from the other end of the pipe to the present spot. Naturally, as the shot struck him in the back, Talbot could only conjecture in his dying moments that Leonard was his cowardly assailant.

Running from the place at breathless speed, Alice, with tear-stained face summoned what assistance she could, and, as the news spread, a considerable portion of the village folk quickly made their way to the carriage drive to see such a phenomenal death-trap in full working order.

Meanwhile, on the "Cease fire" being sounded, search was made at the new range, and there, sure enough, was discovered a large gaping hole quite close to the last target, from which the unseen pipe directly led by a long, tortuous course beneath the ground to the place where it abruptly ended by Talbot's Farm.

* * * * *

Once again did Cherry Linton have a great gala day, soon after Leonard's release from durance, and on this occasion accompanied by the merry jangle of village wedding bells, which entirely owed their present sweet office to a woman's heroism, love and Heaven-sent intuition. Vivian Grey.

To Protect Children from Deafness.

A plea on behalf of children with defective hearing is published in the last issue of the "Review of Ear Diseases." The Editor points out the necessity for frequent tests of the hearing, and gives some excellent advice on the care and treatment of the ears, which should be read by all parents who take an interest in their children's future. As this number of the "Review" is intended for public benefit, a free copy can be obtained by addressing the Editor, Drouet Institute, 10, Marble Arch, London, W. Another special feature of the "Review" is the enclosure of a Patient's Report Form, for the benefit of those who wish advice, for which no fee is charged, if given by correspondence. The Editor advises patients, however, when possible, to visit the Drouet Institute for a personal consultation with the medical staff. Consulting hours are—in the morning, 10 to 12, and in the afternoon, 2 to 4, week days only. A fee of five shillings is charged for personal consultation.

Lonely Microbes.

She: "There are microbes in kisses." He: "Aren't your microbes lonely?"

Thought She'd Improved Them.

He: "What's the matter with these cigars?" She: "Why, dear, they smelt so horrid that I put some eau-de-Cologne on them!"

A Good Hater.

Notting: "How can you sit here with that Chaffer woman playing on that confounded piano of hers in the next flat?" Helter: "Oh, I enjoy it. It reminds me that she is Chaffer's wife. I hate Chaffer, you know."

Not Inconsistent.

"I'm afraid of you," said Miss Kittish to Mr. Callow, saucily. "That's stwange," replied Mr. Callow. "A few minutes ago you—aw—said that you were afraid of nothing, doncher know." "Well, what of that?"

Careful of his Trousers.

Miss Cashley: "You have dropped your handkerchief on the floor, Mr. Van Dudekin." Van Dudekin (preparing to get on his knees): "I did it with a purpose, dear Miss Cashley—er—Edith, I love you; will you be my wife?"

Mother Understood.

"My dear," said Mrs. Richleigh to her daughter the other evening, after young Woodby had departed, "how in the world did your hair become so disarranged?" "Why, mamma," replied the quick-witted miss, "I suppose it must be from shaking my head so much when Mr. Woodby was trying to coax me to say yes." And the mother suddenly remembered that she had once been a girl herself.

Coincidence.

"Somehow, I'm awfully stupid to-night," remarked young Borum, languidly the other evening. "Indeed you are," retorted Miss Cutting, somewhat impulsively. "Do you really mean that?" asked the young man in surprise. "I merely indorsed your remarks; didn't you just now assert that you were stupid?" she queried. "Yes," he responded, "but I only said so without thinking." "And up to the time you spoke of it," she replied, "I only thought so without saying it."

The Press Did its Duty.

"Oh, I think it must be so nice to be connected with a newspaper," said Miss M'Flinn to young Quilldriver, as they sat together one evening. "Yes, it is so," he replied. "But why do you think it is?" "Why, it has so many advantages. I should think you would glory in the freedom, the power, the liberty, and all the privileges of the Press." "Certainly I do. It's a pity with all your enthusiasm on the subject that you are not a journalist." "I think so, too; but you know it is hard for a woman to get recognition. I should be delighted to think that the Press embraced me." "Oh, you would, would you? Great Scott! wait till I turn down the gas."

Good for the Other One.

He paid her a thousand golden sovereigns, for damages done to her heart, and with it she and her true lover were able to get quite a start.

There Wouldn't be Time.

"I would die a thousand deaths for you," said the villain in his most silken tones. "I fear me much," said the heroine, whose love was growing cold, "that the piece will not run that long."

The Decrease of Love.

Rollins: "I begin to doubt whether my wife still loves me as she used to do." Collins: "Why so?" Rollins: "Because I came home last night with my hair cut and she never noticed it."

A Man Under the Bed.

"Old Miss Sere saw a man under her bed at last." "Good gracious! What did she say?" "She told him to look out for the plastering. He was carrying the bed downstairs on his head. You see, she moved yesterday."

His Terrible Confession.

She: "Before we are married and it is for ever too late, confess to me whether there is anything in your past life that you think I might not approve of." He (trembling): "Well, if you must know all, I kept a diary for nearly three weeks once."

Change was Good.

"Vain, vain," he cried in agony. "For I am a poor man, while you have been reared up in the lap of luxury." Into her eyes came a dreamy look, such as ordinary persons affect when their corns hurt them; but she was no ordinary person. "One lap gets mighty monotonous," she observed gently, for there was her maidenly reserve to be thought of.

Liked the Setting.

"Your every tooth is a milk-white pearl," tenderly whispered the lover fond. And softly laughed the winsome girl when the moonshine caught in her tresses blonde. His lips neared hers, but before they met in a kiss, the rest of the world forgetting, "You like pearls, then?" said the small coquette, "Not so much," he replied, "as I like their setting."

Caught in a Box.

"Why is it," he asked, "that beautiful women are always the most stupid?" "Sir," she replied, "am I to understand that you desire to cast reflections upon my mental capacity?" "Oh, no," he hurriedly returned; "I have always said that you were one of the cleverest girls I ever——" But he didn't finish. Before he could do so he realised that he had said the wrong thing, and could never make it right.

Easy to Promise.

In her heart love and duty strove for mastery, and duty won. "No man shall wed me," she exclaimed, with suffused eyes and quivering lips, "who does not promise me that if he is ever Prime Minister of the United Kingdom he will use his influence to have battleships christened with water!" Such was the ardour of his passion that Algernon hesitated not a moment. "I promise," he cried, and fell upon his knees.

After the First Quarrel.

"Go!" she exclaimed, "and never speak to me again!" He passed out into the unsympathetic night, but paused when he reached the street, and drew something bright from one of his inside pockets. As he did so, the beautiful girl, who was watching him from the front door, uttered a shrill scream and ran towards him. "Albert," she cried, "what would you do? Pray do not kill yourself! Throw your revolver away, and let us forget our quarrel." "It isn't a revolver," he replied, as he caught her in his arms. "It's a sixpenny spanner I borrowed from you that day my bicycle broke down. I have been wearing it next to my heart ever since." Then they returned to the parlour and took up the thread of love's dream where it had been broken.

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

A Case of Corpulence.

"GEETY" is only nineteen, but is getting very fat. How can she prevent herself from growing too corpulent? Exercise is the best thing—plenty of walking, if you can get it, or any other outdoor occupation that comes your way. Then, as to diet, don't eat much pastry, sweets, or jam, avoid taking sugar in your tea or too much butter, and make your diet as simple as possible. A few months of this will soon show you whether or not you are able to reduce your weight by ordinary means. If not, then consult a doctor.

A Question of a Ring.

"SHOULD I accept a ring from a young fellow I have been meeting for four months?" writes "KIDDIE." "I am a barmaid, not yet eighteen years old, and though I like him very well, I don't feel that I love him. He is four years older than I, and very anxious for us to become engaged."

* * * * *

You are rather young, "KIDDIE," to become engaged. And as you have not made up your mind as to your feelings towards the young man, wait awhile before you pledge yourself to him. You have plenty of time, and should not be too rash just now, as perhaps you will meet someone you really love, and that would lead to great trouble if you were engaged.

Calf Love Symptoms.

"MATER" is troubled as to her son. He is nineteen, and for weeks past has been out very late at night. He gives the excuse either that he has been late at the office, or with his male friends, and yet his manner is usually very reserved.

* * * * *

It looks like a case of love. You had better let it go on, "MATER," as it is a thing most boys experience at his age, and little good comes of interference by parents. If the affair continues, and looks like lasting, tell him you know all about it, and ask him to bring the girl home. She may, for all you know, be quite the right sort, and though she is young, a man never loses by the society of a good and true woman, even though he may not yet be able to propose marriage.

Caught Red Handed.

"A. S." is a young man, and has been courting a very pretty girl for some time without his parents' knowledge. The other day they went out of town, and "A.S." thinking the coast was clear, asked the girl to go to his home and have tea. On his arrival with the girl, he was met in the hall by his mother, who had unexpectedly returned. How should he have explained his conduct?

* * * * *

He should have at once introduced the girl as a lady friend. If he was not ashamed of her, this would be the only straightforward thing to do. To attempt to conceal matters by deception would only embarrass both yourself and the girl.

Getting Introductions.

"G. O. E." has read my advice on the subject of mutual friends, and how girls and young men should employ them in the affairs of the heart. She is attracted by a man she does not know, like a great many others, and knows that both of them have mutual friends who could secure the introduction. Who should take the first step in the matter?

* * * * *

I would first find out from a mutual friend whether the young man is interested in you, and if they do not know, get them to find out. If he is, then the mutual friend might well be employed in giving the introductions. But if he is really so taken by you, he would probably have put the machinery in motion earlier. It is the man's province to take the first steps in getting to know a girl.

In Love with a Scholar.

"ANNIE" is very much in love with a man ten years older than herself. He is a very clever man, and a great scholar, whose conversation is far above "ANNIE'S" head. How could she make known to him the fact that she is so attracted?

* * * * *

You had better first see if he shows any signs of being equally interested in you. A girl should never "throw her cap" at a man, particularly one who is her superior mentally. Very likely he is like most other clever men, fonder of the society of simple girls than those of his own mental rank. In this case he will certainly show you whether or not he is interested in you. When with the man avoid trying to appear his equal in knowledge. That is a mistake. Men like girls to be natural.

Madness in the Family.

"SHOULD a man let his fiancé know all his family affairs?" asks "F.R." "I am sorry to say that many of my relations have developed insanity, and I myself am given to fits of depression. If I told the girl this, it might make her parents break off the match."

* * * * *

If she has known you long enough to be engaged to you I suppose she knows how far your fits of depression are likely to mean anything serious. Insanity, of course, does run in families, but it doesn't at all follow that you are likely to develop it, though probably if your mind were overstrained, or you had a great deal of worry, you would be less able to bear it than people whose families are free from such trouble. The only thing is for you to lead as quiet a life as possible, and avoid over-excitement. If your fits of depression are really serious take medical advice, and base whatever you tell the girl on the doctor's verdict.

Would it be Forward?

"MY dilemma is great," writes "LONESOME." "The other day I dropped my handkerchief, and a young man I admire very much picked it up for me. Would it be forward for me to bow to him next time we meet?"

* * * * *

What a curious thing it should be that it was a very young man who picked it up, and was it quite accidental, "LONESOME?" Yes, it would be rather forward for you to bow to him next time. But such forward things are done very often in this world. Sometimes they have very happy results.

* * * * *

If it would be possible for you to get to know the man socially, and you know that he is a desirable acquaintance, of whom your parents would approve, the bow might not be altogether a mistake. If he is a casual young man of whom you know nothing, and whom you could not meet without resort to deception, then I think you had better not encourage him to make your acquaintance.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

MISS CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st., and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Riseholm Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."

"West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets, which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

MRS. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

Mr. MCLEOD, 44 Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

COUNT EHRENWAUD, of Listorp, Sweden, writes, 9th Oct., 1899: "The person who took Tablets lost 18.b. during the cure.

Mr. GIBBS, 147 Richmond Park, Kimberworth, Rotherham, says: "Since I began with them they have reduced me 2st. 3lb., and I am pleased to say I am a great deal better in health and in every way."

Mrs. FENTON, 11 Wood Street, Tyldesley, writes: "Been fat all my life, but now your Tablets tell a tale. I have lost 17lb. already and am delighted."

Mrs. MARY WILLIAMS, of Old Yard, near Redol, Bagillt, Wales, writes Nov. 22nd, 1898: "Your Tablets reduced me 2st., and have benefited me greatly."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 4lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Mrs. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablet has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

Mrs. PEARCE, Armstrong Road, Benwell: "Reduced from 12st. to 9½st., and do not get any heavier."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs., says: "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mrs. ROLLITT, of North Farm, Letwell, says: "Tablets have done a world of good—reduced 14lb. already without altering diet."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Mrs. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of 1st. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRÄD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

Miss JANE CARTER of Forthampton House, Tewkesbury, says: "The Tablets are of the greatest value I am reduced many stone, and shall be pleased to recommend them."

Mr. THOS BLAKELY, of 37 The Grove, Bedford, writes: "I have lost a little over 42lb. since taking your Tablets, and my case causes much local interest."

Miss F. L. BALL, 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets. They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

Miss PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets. I have lost 2st., and am sufficiently reduced."

THE BOND BETWEEN.

A Romance of Real Life.

By BLANCHE EARDLEY.

PROLOGUE.

"THOSE whom God hath joined together let no man put asunder." The sacred words were droned in monotonous tones by a lean, apathetic curate. The church is empty save for the two principals—Margaret Heath and Vernon Grant—and the necessary witnesses. After the ceremony, the bride and bridegroom leave for Paris.

Digby Scarlett turns over his letters leisurely in the interim between breakfast and sorting a cigar.

"Ah, here's one from my friend and collaborator, the valiant Vernon. I wonder what the Paris postmark means? Any way, it can wait until I have written to ask the adorable Margaret Heath to be my wife."

This done, he opens Vernon's letter, and when he reads the news of the latter's marriage to the girl to whom he has just penned a proposal, he murmurs—

"Twice hit by the same hand, and both blows destined to die with me—to bleed internally. Not bad for a man intellectually my inferior! But the third blow I shall get in. My innings begins to-day." Then he leaves for Paris to join the happy couple at their invitation.

Scarlett and Grant at one time had practised copying each other's signatures, and Grant had been very successful in his imitations of that of his friend. Now Scarlett persuades him, for a bet, to sign his name to a cheque for a large amount, promising to make it all right at the bank when presented. This, however, he fails to do, and Grant is arrested and sentenced to fifteen years' penal servitude for forgery, Scarlett not even saying a word in his defence. Mrs. Grant goes to the prison to bid her husband farewell, and tells him that she will never have anything more to do with him.

The First Chapters.

LADY MAITLAND is the young second wife of Sir Trevor Maitland of Maitland Manor, Melton. She captivates everyone by her extreme beauty. Sir Trevor has three children—Jack, Agnes, and Muriel—by his first wife, and an only son, Woolf, by the present Lady Maitland.

Shortly after Sir Trevor's second marriage a baby-girl is found in the Manor grounds. She is intrusted to the care of Mrs. Parkins, the lodgekeeper's wife. The name of Ivy Strange is given to the child, and at the time of our story Jack Maitland is in love with her.

Heriot North, an old friend of the family, who visits the Manor to pay his addresses to Agnes, succumbs to the charms of Sir Trevor's young wife, to the great chagrin of Agnes, who is accordingly neglected. There is nothing Lady Maitland will not do for her boy Woolf. One evening when she goes to her room to dress for dinner she finds there an ex-convict and burglar—Mike Holland—who says that he was in gaol with her first husband, and unless she pays him well to keep silence he will blazon to the world the fact that she is a bigamist.

Lady Maitland protests that her first husband is dead, but to preserve the good name of her boy she consents to pay the price, and intrusts Heriot North with the first payment, twenty pounds, which is to be left at a certain place in London for Holland to call for.

Ivy Strange refuses to become engaged to Jack until the mystery of her birth is cleared up. This her lover promises to do, and to start with interviews Mrs. Parkins. The only information he gleans from her is that on Ivy's brow—hidden under her curls—when she was a baby there was a mark like the mark of a broad arrow! Jack goes to London to consult a detective, Gilbert Chase. Afterwards at his club he meets Digby Scarlett, a celebrated explorer. Scarlett accepts Jack's invitation to accompany him to Maitland Manor.

The night of their arrival Ivy brings Lady Maitland a note, written on a dirty piece of paper. It ran as follows:

"The man you got the laugh over is now going to laugh at you. You lied to me. I know that your first husband still lives. I 'ave seen 'im. Send or rite by return to M.H. post office, Chorlton, inclosing five 'undred pounds or will call at Manor and tell all."

After reading it Lady Maitland gets Ivy to write a note saying that she is sending half the money to the same place in London as she forwarded the twenty pounds.

When the girl has slipped away Lady Maitland takes the dirty piece of paper and drops it in the fire. "I only wish I could do the same with the writer," she mutters. "I see that I shall have to fight hard, but for my boy I will risk anything. Now to go and see this wonderful friend of Jack's."

With a tender smile on her lips she goes softly downstairs.

"Ah!" says her husband's voice, as she enters the room, "let me introduce Jack's friend, my dear."

The man comes forward slowly, a gleam of dazzling teeth throwing up the blackness of his moustache. Sir Trevor Maitland's wife glances up at him with a swift smile of welcome.

"This," continues Sir Trevor, "is Mr. Digby Scarlett—my wife!"

THE BOND BETWEEN.

ELEVENTH CHAPTER.

Recognition.

Digby Scarlett strolled thoughtfully into the village of Melton. It was a fine, bright day, the damp and fog of the last week had given way to a mild, almost humid atmosphere, and the sky overhead was clear and blue.

But it was not of the elements and their pranks that Digby Scarlett was thinking. Everything was forgotten, swamped in the baffling uncertainty of a haunting memory, that both mocked and lured him on at the same time. It was a woman's face, brilliant, haughty, and surpassingly beautiful, that blotted out every other vision. The face of the woman who had played to perfection the rôle of his hostess four nights ago—Sir Trevor Maitland's wife!

"Bah!" he muttered. "I must be mad to connect the two! She would not dare! Besides, when I failed to trace her at the time, I saw afterwards, in some continental paper, that she was dead—had died a year after. But this woman is marvellously like! She nearly took my breath away! I wonder whether I could satisfy myself," he mused thoughtfully. "I hate playing in the dark!"

"What! All alone, Mr. Scarlett?" said a voice behind him; and turning quickly, he saw Agnes Maitland hurrying towards him. Her sallow face was slightly flushed, and an agreeable smile parted her thin, pale lips.

He smiled grimly. This elderly, young lady did not appeal to him in the least, but he saw that he had found favour in her eyes. He had also been quick to notice that she bore no love for her beautiful step-mother. Probably she would be useful.

"Yes, Miss Maitland," he answered, "I am investigating for myself! But I might also apply the same remark to you," he added laughingly; "you appear to be alone, too!"

"I usually am," she said, the smile fading from her face, and the acid look returning to it. "But you are our guest; I am afraid you will think us very negligent."

He laughed.

"I like being alone, Miss Maitland. I am never in such good company as when my thoughts walk side by side with me! But you are different," he went on lightly. "I should have imagined that you would find your step-mother just a fellow-companion—an elder sister, in fact."

A bitter laugh broke from Agnes Maitland.

"My step-mother is my father's wife, Mr. Scarlett. I do not know her any better than I did the day she came to the Manor with him, fifteen years ago."

"Ah! She must have been a girl almost," he said thoughtfully, "while you were a child."

Agnes Maitland flushed.

"She was a widow when my father married her—a Mrs. Vernon," she said tartly.

Digby Scarlett started. His doubts did not appear so ridiculous after all!

"Really?" he said carelessly. "I must compliment Lady Maitland upon her youthful appearance! Were you going to the village, Miss Maitland?" he asked. "Because if I can do anything for you there, it will give me much pleasure. I am going to the post-office, to inquire for letters."

She hesitated.

"Thank you, but there is nothing, Mr. Scarlett. I was only going to call on an old woman in the parish, but will postpone it, as I find I may be late. You will probably meet Jack," she smiled. "If he is not at the lodge, he is generally in the village."

She turned and retraced her steps. Digby Scarlett looked after her, a queer smile on his cynical mouth.

As he was inquiring for letters at the post-office—having given that address at the club for any correspondence to be forwarded—a man came in after him, and bought some stamps, then threw a careless glance at him that changed to a look of interest, as the post-mistress said: "One letter for Mr. Digby Scarlett."

As Digby Scarlett left the post-office the man gazed after him. "That face and name seem oddly familiar!" he muttered; "especially the name. I wonder who he is, and what he is doing here."

The voice of the post-mistress roused him. "Here are your stamps, Mr. North." He took them, then left the office, and was just in time to see Digby Scarlett talking to Lady Maitland, who was driving her dogcart into the village.

After a brief pause, the jealous eyes of the man on the post-office steps saw his divinity make room for the stranger in the trap, and drive off with him in the direction of Maitland Manor.

Heriot North watched them out of sight, then walked away slowly. As he passed the "New Age Inn," a man lurched out, falling against him. With a disgusted gesture he flung him from him, then started with surprise, for the drink-sodden wretch, looking at him with bleary eyes, was the same disreputable loafer whom he had seen in the District Messenger Depôt in Regent Street, a couple of weeks ago.

"I hope that creature has not taken advantage of Lady Maitland's generosity to beg from her again," he muttered. "He must find it a lucrative business to take the trouble to come here from London for the purpose!"

In the meantime Digby Scarlett was listening to the gay, careless chatter of the radiant woman who was driving him back to the Manor.

"Well, Mr. Scarlett," she laughed. "I suppose our dull little village will bore you to death after a few days, and you will be hungering for the frivolities of town?"

"On the contrary," he replied. "I was thinking of inquiring whether there was a house to let in this neighbourhood; it is time I settled down."

The hands holding the reins trembled slightly, and a slight pucker furrowed the satin-like brow of his companion.

"I am afraid you will be disappointed," she laughed. "There were one or two small shooting-boxes to let last season, but they have been snapped up lately."

"Ah!" he murmured; "that's a pity. I was hoping to know more of the people of Melton than I do now; they interest me."

Lady Maitland did not reply. She was wondering feverishly whether this man recognised, in the polished, stately wife of the squire of Melton, the unformed girl of eighteen years ago! She thought not! She prayed not! His eyes had told her nothing a few nights before, when the name of Digby Scarlett had been a bolt from the blue of her security! His face she had not recognised; but the name—that had ever haunted her like a shadow.

"By the way," Digby Scarlett said carelessly, "I met your daughter, Agnes, a few moments ago."

"My daughter!" she exclaimed—her eyes contracting suddenly. "I have no daughter—only a son."

"I meant step-daughter, Lady Maitland," he laughed easily; "and she told me that your name, before you married Sir Trevor, was Mrs. Vernon."

"That is true," she said coldly; a strange sense of coming disaster making her feel faint.

"I wonder," the calm, well-bred voice went on, "whether you ever met a woman I once knew—her name was Vernon, only that was her husband's Christian name. I believe their surname was—or, rather, is, for they still live—Grant!"

A stifled exclamation rose to the lips of the woman holding the reins, now loosely, between frozen fingers.

"I don't remember," she said, in a low, intense voice. "My life has been so full of changes, that I forget half the people I have met."

The man by her side smiled. "I can understand your forgetting some people, Lady Maitland," he said carelessly. "By-the-way, what an extremely charming pet name your young step-daughter, Miss Muriel, calls you by. It is an abbreviation for—Margaret, I presume?"

She raised her eyes to his with a haggard desperation in them. "No, Mr. Scarlett; it is no abbreviation," she said slowly. "My Christian name is Pearl."

Digby Scarlett's black eyes met hers with mocking deference. He had learnt what he had only suspected.

"And it is a name that suits you, Lady Maitland. Ah! Look out!" he said quickly; "you nearly had us in the ditch then!"

She laughed recklessly. "Oh, that is nothing; you will meet with more serious mishaps than that, Mr. Scarlett."

As they turned into the drive, Sir Trevor was standing at the lodge gates, speaking to Parkins. "Ah, my dear," he said. "Have you been showing our pretty county to Mr. Scarlett?"

His wife smiled. "I think we have both contributed to each other's amusements, Trevor."

"Yes, Sir Trevor," replied Scarlett, "I was fearfully disappointed to learn from Lady Maitland that there is no place to let about here. I had hoped to become one of yourselves as a neighbour."

"Why, my dear Pearl!" said Sir Trevor to his wife; "surely you forget the 'Rest' near us? That is to let, Mr. Scarlett, and it would be a very good thing if you could take it."

"I am sorry," laughed Lady Maitland carelessly; "I had forgotten the 'Rest' when I spoke to Mr. Scarlett."

When he was alone, Digby Scarlett smiled grimly. "I fancy my stay at Melton will be an eventful one! She fears me already; she knows that her secret is mine! Perhaps I may have to use my power—soon!" And his fingers stroked his moustache with the same old trick he had had when clean-shaven.

* * * * *

Lady Maitland dismissed her maid, and paced the floor of her dressing-room with long, swift steps that sank softly into the velvet pile of the carpet. Her lips were closed in a thin, scarlet line, and her eyes glittered strangely. "He knows me! He knows me!" she murmured. "I shall be unable to buy him off as I do the—other——! He does not need money. What then will he exact for his silence?"

She brushed the thick hair from her brow, and gazed at herself in the glass. It was a drawn, haggard face that glanced back at her—the ghost of the woman of a month ago!

"I almost wish," she murmured, "that you had died at the time you sent that notice to the papers! Now your life is going to be a living death! Unless"—she threw back her head and laughed. "But it is early days to cry 'Peccavi!' I will not give in, for his sake—the happiness and honour of my boy will spur me on to meet my enemies! He shall never learn to blush for his mother!"

She flung herself down by a chair. She did not usually pray, but her lips moved in a passion of supplication, and the refrain of her prayer was, "For his sake! For his sake! For his sake!"

TWELFTH CHAPTER.

The Face in the Photograph.

"ARE you going to the meet, Maitland, or will you leave me to the tender mercies of Miss Muriel again?" Digby Scarlett laughed lightly. It was the morning after his drive with Lady Maitland, and he was in a genial mood.

"Well, I may follow you afterwards," replied Sir Trevor's son and heir evasively. "I have something to do first. But Muriel will be with you," he added, "to say nothing of the mater, who is a fine rider to hounds. You were in at the death the last time you rode with us, eh, mater?"

Digby Scarlett bowed his head in the direction of Lady Maitland, who sat at the head of the table. He, being a guest, was on her right hand. "To die would be easy in such a presence!"

She laughed carelessly. "I hope we shall all parade as much pluck in our own death as we do at that of the poor fox, Mr. Scarlett!"

"The fox has nothing to complain of," he said slowly. "It has a good run, and it only has itself to blame if it 'breaks cover' too early!"

Their eyes met, and the challenge lurking in the depths of the woman's startled him. She rose from the table with a light laugh.

"The hound is a generous enemy, Mr. Scarlett, and kills quickly. It is only the higher race that stoop to torture!"

She swept out of the room with the graceful dignity for which she had become so celebrated, and Digby Scarlett sent a flash of admiration after her. "She will fight to the bitter end!" he thought, but the idea pleased him. It would add zest to the victory, to win it over a foe that dies hard!

As he rode with Muriel and Sir Trevor to the meet—Lady Maitland having pleaded a headache, and Agnes being no horsewoman—they saw Jack coming away from the lodge, and strolling along the Melton Road. He was not alone; a slight, graceful figure was beside him, and they appeared to be deep in conversation.

Sir Trevor's face clouded. "That son of mine throws up every other obligation to pursue a will o' the wisp!" he muttered. "I am sorry he has no consideration for his duties as your part host, Mr. Scarlett," and he turned apologetically to their guest, who had grown strangely quiet.

He had not forgotten the face in the likeness he had confiscated the night of the fog in London, and it had become a custom for him to look at it every night and morning before returning it to its hiding-place.

He wondered at not having heard anything of a fiancée, or seen the original of that bewitching fairy, and now he wondered whether the girl with Jack was the living possessor of so much beauty.

"Don't mention it, Sir Trevor," he said easily, "I was young once myself," and he smiled, grimly.

"Were you, really?" said Muriel, looking at him curiously. "Somehow, you suggest an impression of having looked through centuries, your eyes have such a world-weary expression in them, just like the Sphinx!"

"Muriel!" said her father reprovingly, but Digby Scarlett laughed, the girl's frank criticism amused him.

"Perhaps Miss Muriel is right, Sir Trevor. I am almost a veteran now, but not so old that beauty fails to touch me!"

"Ah," said Muriel proudly, "you have only dreamt of beauty, so far, Mr. Scarlett, when you see Ivy you will meet it."

"Ivy?" he said quickly. "Who is she? Your sister?"

Before she could reply, they had arrived at the meet, and soon after, conversation was dispensed with in favour of the more exciting pastime.

Two hours later, Digby Scarlett walked his horse slowly through the lanes of Melton. He had gradually let the rest of the field lose sight of him, and then quietly turned back and followed the road they had traversed earlier in the day.

As he drew near the outskirts of the wood lying behind the Manor, he gave a start of surprise, for standing in the open, yet sufficiently concealed from public view to allow of low-voiced confidences being exchanged, were two figures.

He reined in his horse and gazed curiously at them.

One was a low, vicious-looking man of the tramp species, with a cruel face and crafty, squinting eyes. But it was on his companion that Digby Scarlett gazed with wonder and startled admiration. For the face of the girl talking to the man with the evil eyes, was the original of the photograph he had so long cherished. But it was so far removed from that unflattering prototype that he almost laughed with joy when he remembered how he had looked for her to be like it.

As he gazed, drinking in the girl's unconscious beauty with thirsty eyes, his brow grew puzzled. He had, on comparing the face in the photo with one that belonged to the years that had gone, described it as possessing the beauty of the pearl, while that of the other had had the brilliancy of the diamond, and an indescribable atmosphere about her sent his thoughts speeding backwards.

Digitized by Google

"I wonder who she is?" he muttered, "and what that blackguardly ruffian wants with her? Anyway, I mean to find out her name, somehow!"

He flung himself lightly out of the saddle, tied his horse to a tree, then stepped behind a bush where he could see and hear without being seen.

"Now then!" said the coarse voice of the man, "I've 'ad enough of excuses. What I wants I means to get, or I'll know the reason why!"

The reply of the girl barely reached the ears of the listening man, so low and quiet was her voice. "I'm sorry, that is all you can have now. But if you return to London you will have more sent to the address that the first was forwarded to. That is all I can tell you. And," she went on, in the low, monotonous tone, as though repeating a lesson she had learnt, "it is dangerous for you to stay here."

"Hallo!" thought Digby Scarlett, "I have discovered a case of blackmail. This is interesting."

The man laughed brutally. "Dangerous! Not much! I'm going to be on the spot! The secret I know is worth a bloomin' mint to me! I'll chance the rest!"

The girl clasped her hands convulsively, and the keen eyes of the man behind the bush saw tears glistening on her lashes.

"Oh, no," she murmured, "please go! I will give you all I have, if you will only leave Melton!"

"All right, miss!" he laughed. "Begin by giving me that gold bracelet on your wrist!"

She drew back quickly. "No, no, not that! I cannot part with that!"

An ugly look crossed the man's coarse mouth. "I want that, I tell yer, or——!" He caught her arm suddenly, and a low cry came from her lips.

Digby Scarlett gripped his hunting crop tightly, and his breath came from him in laboured pants.

"Stow that!" snarled the bully, "or I'll jolly soon silence you for good!"

He raised his hand quickly towards her with an oath, but it was intercepted by another hand that caught his arm from behind him in a vice-like grip, and the next moment he was flung violently aside. Then, as he turned to see who had attacked him, his collar was seized firmly, and for a few seconds the air was filled by the sharp, stinging whirr—rr—of a whip being cut quickly on to a fleshy, writhing body.

"There, you confounded scoundrel! Let that be a lesson to you not to attempt to bully a lady again, or your next dose will be a little stronger!" and, livid with rage, Digby Scarlett gave his victim a final shake, then dropped him on to the brown earth, where he lay speechless, and terrified by the sudden change matters had taken.

He rose to his feet painfully, his long upper lip was quivering with fear, and the look he threw at the girl and her protector was malignant and full of hate.

"So yer set someone on to watch me, eh, me beauty?" he said to the shrinking girl. "Then let me tell 'im the little secret we share together!"

"Shall I thrash him again?" said Scarlett, turning to her. "He deserves it!"

"Oh, no, let him go!" she murmured in a low tone. "Send him away now!"

"This lady has spared you another thrashing!" he said in a stern, cold voice. "If you don't instantly make yourself scarce, I shall follow you, and finish what I have only just begun!"

With an evil leer the man slunk off, the early November mist enveloping his figure as he stole between the thick trunks of the trees that grew more frequent as he reached the interior of the wood.

Then Digby Scarlett turned again to the girl, whose white face and strained, violet eyes told of the ordeal through which she had passed.

"I hope you are not hurt in any way?" he asked. "I am glad I happened to be riding this way."

She put out her slim, white hand with a pretty gesture.

"Oh, no! Not hurt, only frightened. I am afraid to think what would have occurred had you not come to my rescue!" And she lifted her eyes to his with an appealing gratitude that thrilled him. He was not accustomed to such glances from women.

"It was an honour to me to be of service to you," he said, but he did not think it necessary to mention that he had listened to part of her conversation.

"I am afraid these lonely woods are not safe for anyone quite so—so young and unprotected as yourself, to visit alone," he went on. "That ruffian may lurk about here again in the hope of seeing you. Will you promise me that you will take more care of yourself in the future?"

She flushed, and her eyes filled with sudden tears. "I am afraid I cannot go so far as that," she murmured; "my way lies through the woods very often."

"Then I shall constitute myself your guardian," he said lightly, and noticed that a momentary fear leapt to her eyes, and that her lips trembled.

"It is very kind of you; but I would rather you did not trouble," she replied. "I shall be quite safe in future—really!"

He smiled. "I only hope so! But I am not so sanguine as you seem to be. These woods are horrid places for such desperadoes as our late friend!"

As she walked silently by his side he asked himself curiously what secret this pure, beautiful girl with the tender eyes could possibly share with the drink-sodden tramp he had punished so summarily.

"By the way," he said, "may I know to whom I have had the honour of tendering some slight service?"

She blushed suddenly, but answered with simple dignity, "My name is Ivy Strange."

"Ivy Strange," he murmured thoughtfully; "I wonder are you related to the Stranges of Durham?"

"I think not," she said coldly, another wave of colour sweeping from brow to throat.

"I am staying at the Manor," he went on easily; "my name is Digby Scarlett."

Her eyes flashed with a sudden light. "Oh, then you are the friend of whom Jack—I mean Mr. Maitland"—she corrected herself hastily—"has spoken to me!"

He smiled. "I have that honour; you live in this neighbourhood then?" he queried. "I wonder I have not met you before at the Manor or at the dance at the Town Hall, to which all Melton went."

She blushed hotly, then raised her head with a proud gesture. "You will see me at none of these functions, Mr. Scarlett. I go up to the Manor to see my friend, Muriel Maitland, but never stay there. I am the child of the lodge-keeper of Maitland Manor."

For a moment he was taken aback. She so entirely possessed all the outward attributes of a well-born woman that the idea of her being only a child of the people after all, was a sudden extinguisher upon his hopes. But he looked at her again, and the sight of her perfect profile silhouetted against the grey background of the barren trees made him laugh at his scruples.

"Such beauty as hers is a pedigree in itself," he thought.

"I must pay the lodge a visit one day, if I may," he said; "and pay my respects to Mrs. Strange."

For a moment the girl's mouth quivered, as if with sudden laughter; but she murmured demurely, "Thank you, sir; mother will be pleased to see you."

All the time they had chatted he had walked beside her, leading his horse by the bridle, and as they reached the Manor gates Ivy Strange stopped suddenly. "This is my home," she said, with a gesture towards the lodge, "I will say 'Good afternoon,' and thank you once more for your protection. But," she went on, quickly, raising earnest eyes to his, "may I presume to ask you a great favour?"

"Certainly," he murmured, "a request from your lips will be a command."

She smiled. "It is only to ask you not to mention at the Manor the rough man you saved me from. Sir Trevor and—and Lady Maitland may be anxious and perhaps annoyed; and as I owe them a great deal I should not like to offend them."

He bent his head. "I will obey you, you may rely on me, Miss Strange."

He watched her into the lodge, his hat in his hand, and as the door closed upon her he turned slowly to walk up the drive with his docile steed.

"That girl to be the child of a common lodge-keeper!" he muttered. "Incredible; yet, unfortunately, true! I understand now what vexed the old squire when he saw his son and heir philandering about with her this morning!" He shut his mouth with a savage snap, as he thought of possible love passages that might have passed between them.

Then he laughed cynically. "Bah, it's the way of all sons and heirs to amuse themselves; he is only a boy, and must marry well, for the title's sake; but I—I have no one to please but myself, and may pick my bride from the gutter if I choose. But I must find out what that low scamp was threatening her about! I won't have a mystery around the woman that I intend to make mine!"

He went to the stables, gave his horse to a groom, then entered the drawing-room in time for tea.

"Hallo, Scarlett!" said Sir Trevor; "where did you go off to? We missed you at the finish."

Digby Scarlett laughed easily. "I'm sorry I dropped out; but, to tell the truth, I felt suddenly ill, and thought it wisest to turn back in time. I had lunch on my few sandwiches in the wood, and was incidental in rendering a small service to a lovely damsel in distress!"

"Who was that, Mr. Scarlett?" said the low voice of Lady Maitland. "I did not know that Melton beauties grew in the wood."

He looked at her curiously. She was wearing her favourite colour—white, and her face was very pale, while her deep violet eyes shone brilliantly under the coronet of warm hair. He felt strangely that she was, in some indefinable way, knit to him by a tie—a tie of silence, that only he would break when he chose.

"It was a young lady," he said slowly. "A beggar was importuning her for money—I stepped in, and suggested that he should apply to the local union!"

Lady Maitland's eyes contracted with an unspoken thought, and she bit her lip with a sudden spasm. "Did you discover this modern Andromeda's name?" she said, looking at him closely through her long lashes.

He laughed. "I fancy she said it was Strange—Miss Strange," he answered.

"Miss Strange!" laughed Agnes Maitland, harshly; "that is an honour, Mr. Scarlett! She is usually known about here as Ivy Strange—the foundling from Nowhere!"

Digby Scarlett felt a wave of disgust steal over him for this hard-mouthed virago. "Then all I can say is that Miss Strange conceals the fact, and only struck me as being a gentlewoman!" he replied coldly.

"Thank you, Scarlett," said Jack Maitland, coming up with a white face and angry eyes, "you have done me a great service. Miss Strange, whom you protected from possible insult this morning, will one day be my wife, I hope!"

The two men clasped hands silently, then there was an instant's pause, and Jack Maitland strode out of the room with his friend after him.

When Digby Scarlett was dressing for dinner he laughed softly to himself. "I am afraid my impetuous young friend will not win his heart's desire. He is a nice boy; but that must not stand in the way. My little lady of the violet eyes and red-gold hair will marry me!"

He stopped with a sudden catch, and his lips paled strangely. "That cat called her a foundling from nowhere. Her face, eyes, colouring and hair, of whom did they remind me? By Jove! What a find!" He smiled grimly. "If it should be so—what a crowning of vengeance!"

THIRTEENTH CHAPTER.

Heriot North Makes a Promise.

HERIOT NORTH rose from his lonely dinner table at "The Hollies" and looked at his watch. It was nearly nine o'clock.

"Just time for a stroll round the grounds before turning in to bed," he muttered. "I feel that I should enjoy a ramble."

He took his hat and went down the path, leaving the hall door on the latch. There were only an old man and his wife in the house, who fulfilled the duties of butler and cook respectively, and they retired at any hour they pleased after dinner had been cleared away.

Heriot North pulled at his cigar with long, thoughtful puffs, and his feet took him unconsciously in the direction of Maitland Manor, that loomed, large and imposing, before him.

Of late days he had rather avoided the Manor, until a special reminder from Sir Trevor warned him that a further absence would perhaps compromise the one creature he desired to serve. So, as he drew near, the thought struck him that he would pay an unconventional call before turning in.

"I wonder," he murmured, "why I should have been allowed to meet that woman too late! If only I had come into her life earlier, she might have cared! But now I almost wish that I had never seen her! I might then have been content to marry Agnes!" and a short, mirthless laugh burst from him as the vision of Sir Trevor's Maitland's sour, acid-looking daughter rose before him.

"No! I will live my life at the foot of a shrine," he thought. "The ideal shall never be replaced by an unsympathetic reality."

He sighed resignedly; then walked slowly on, his eyes fixed on the dim light in the lodge windows that acted as a guide to the Manor. Suddenly a sound of voices reached him. They were low, yet distinct, and appeared to come from behind a thick clump of trees that stood near the pathway. There was no moon, and the blackness was intense.

"Ah!" he muttered, "poachers or tramps! I wonder what they are up to."

He paused, and at that moment a deep, gruff voice said: "If I don't get it all by the beginning of the week, I shall throw it up, and queer yer little game! S'elp me if I don't! I bet someone 'll pay me well for the secret I could tell 'im!"

"Silence—you fool!" said another voice; and at the sound of it, Heriot North started violently, and the cigar fell from his nerveless fingers, for the voice was that of the one woman who occupied his thoughts both day and night. He held his breath and listened.

"I have no more money on me just now," went on the low voice, "but—" here the voice grew indistinct and only a murmur reached the ears of the man—"I must slip out, or send someone, with the money on the night of the ball at the Manor."

"Don't go trusting that girl, then!" the deeper voice replied. "She got me a lickin' last time from some cove that's after 'er!" And an oath accompanied the words.

"If I can, I will come," said the woman in a whisper, "if not, I will send her—she knows nothing. Now go!"

The voices died away in the darkness; and, after a time, Heriot North roused himself from the stupor that seemed to have fallen upon him.

That voice, the same as that which had lured him into a momentary self-betrayal! Impossible! It must be one similar in tone, and his constant musing on it had made him think every woman's voice hers! He must find out who the man was, then perhaps he could satisfy himself as to the identity of the woman who shared his secret—whatever it was.

Spurred into activity by the desire to come to the bottom of his suspicions, Heriot North broke into a run that led him beyond the Manor gates into the village.

Just as he was about to give up the wild-goose chase, he saw a solitary male figure loafing ahead of him that paused under the dim light of a lamp. Heriot North followed swiftly behind, his memory stirred by the suspicion of familiarity that lingered round the man.

As he came up to him, the man was turning into the "New Age Inn," and Heriot North caught a full view of his face before he disappeared between the swing doors. As he saw it in that momentary flash he fell back with an exclamation. For the man whom he had overheard speaking to a woman, and had followed from that moment, was the same objectionable creature he had seen in the Regent Street District Messenger Depôt; and again, lurching out of the inn, a few days ago, in an intoxicated condition!

* * * * *

"Ah! North, I'm glad to see you! We were wondering why you had not been near us for so long!" and Sir Trevor Maitland held out a hearty welcome to his guest.

Heriot North murmured some words of conventional greeting to his host, then his eyes sent a questioning glance round the room to encounter the eyes of the stranger he had seen in Melton Post-office some days before.

"Oh you don't know Mr. Scarlett, do you?" Sir Trevor continued; "let me introduce you. Mr. Digby Scarlett—Mr. Heriot North."

The two men exchanged a few commonplace courtesies; an instant, indefinable antagonism springing up between them.

"As you have both lived much in the East, you should have a lot in common," said Jack Maitland genially. The boy was in high form, for he had just left Ivy, whose good-night kiss still lingered on his lips.

"I am afraid that too much in common makes people bad friends, Jack!" laughed Digby Scarlett easily. He had noticed the other man's searching glance round the room, and wondered for whom it had been.

The door suddenly opened, to admit Lady Maitland.

"Ah, Mr. North!" she said, her lips parting in a sweet smile. "You are indeed a stranger!"

He took her hand in his, and flashed a puzzled inquiry into her face. She was looking radiant, in some soft, clinging, black gauze; but his glance was quick to note a rather strained look in her violet eyes, and a metallic ring in her voice.

How could he imagine that this calm, perfectly self-possessed woman was the secret conspirator of the loafer in the village public-house?

And yet some link must exist between them, for the coincidence that Lady Maitland of the Manor should send him on a charity quest to a London address for this self-same tramp, and then, that the creature should turn up in Melton and have a private meeting with the woman possessing the peculiarly sweet voice of Lady Maitland, was what would be described in a police-court as "circumstantial evidence" that some understanding existed.

All this Heriot North argued with himself, as the soft hand of Sir Trevor's wife rested in his; and yet he could not but think that there must be another woman in Melton with her ladyship's voice.

"I walked here through the wood," he said to her; "and almost imagined that I must suddenly have taken leave of my senses."

They had strolled to the other end of the room, and he had lowered his voice involuntarily.

She raised her brows. "Indeed, why?"

"Because I was mad enough to imagine that I heard you speaking to someone on the outskirts!"

She looked at him through half-closed lids that had suddenly fallen over her eyes, her pupils becoming almost like pin pricks.

"That was certainly a mad fancy, Mr. North," she said idly, fingering a long, turquoise chain with slender fingers. "But"—she cast a swift glance over her shoulder to where her husband was deep in some erudite dissertation with Digby Scarlett. "But," she continued in a low, cautious voice, "I wonder whether you will help me in something. You promised to be my friend—you know!" And a mocking smile curved her mouth.

"Indeed, I am always at your service!" he said quickly. "Tell me, is it anything to do with the ruffian I saw to-night? If he is annoying you——"

"I don't understand," she replied coldly. "You saw whom, Mr. North? And what was the man saying to the person you mistook for myself?"

He felt that he had blundered. "I—I beg your pardon," he stammered, "but I heard the man—whom I afterwards recognised in the village—threaten someone about money, and mention a secret. I am afraid, knowing of your kindness to the man, that he was worrying you for more! Let me silence him," he went on in a low voice. "I would do anything to prove my disinterested devotion to you!"

"Anything?" she smiled curiously.

"Yes, anything!" he breathed; and with that vow he sealed his soul to a bondage the chains of which would lie heavy on him all his life!

"Ah!" she laughed lightly. "Then, first of all, Mr. North, you must not imagine that it was myself whom you heard this evening. It was, unfortunately, the waif, Ivy Strange, who lives at the lodge; and I have discovered a sad secret concerning her. The man in the wood is—"

"Ah, Lady Maitland, you are discussing a subject in which I am more than interested!" And Digby Scarlett smiled pleasantly into her face.

She started suddenly. How much had this man, who knew her as no other man present did, heard of her conversation? He was dangerous; and in his presence she felt that a veritable powder-mine yawned under her feet.

"What particular portion of my conversation interests you, Mr. Scarlett?" she said coldly.

He smiled. His intuition had told him that the dark, lean man with the intense eyes and strenuous expression had more than a friendly regard for the lovely châtelaine of Maitland Manor, and his sardonic humour was tickled by the knowledge that he held the strings by which, when he chose, he would make this beautiful puppet dance to any tune he desired.

"The pretty waif—at the lodge," he replied slowly, his black eyes narrowing to a fine glinting sparkle. "Is the engagement between her and Jack to be made public yet?"

"I am not aware that any engagement exists, Mr. Scarlett, between my step-son and the girl at the lodge," Sir Trevor's wife said. "I do not fancy their mutual adoration will go any further than the usual flirtation, in spite of his heroic defence of her the other afternoon! Neither his father nor myself consider it seriously."

She rose and beckoned Heriot North to follow her. He did so silently, having moved away to Agnes' side when Digby Scarlett interrupted them.

"Trevor," said her ladyship to her husband. "I am going to my boudoir to show those miniatures to Mr. North; he is quite an authority on them, I hear."

As they passed through the doorway, Digby Scarlett laughed quietly. "Ah! she is not partial to the idea of Jack either being engaged to the waif, or having the first place as the heir! She would rather her own brat had the precedence."

Then he turned to say something to Agnes, who was standing, gazing out into the darkness. As he approached her, he was startled by the expression of her face. It was white and bitter, and her mouth had a cruel sneer on it.

"The plot thickens!" he murmured. "She is in love with North, who is ditto with the fair Lady of the Manor; and, in consequence, there is no love in her heart for her step-mother!"

"Well, Miss Maitland," he said aloud; "you look busy with thoughts! I wonder if they are on the same subject as my own?"

She turned startled eyes on him. "What were they, Mr. Scarlett?" she said, with a chilly smile.

He lowered his voice, and, casting a glance at the half-closed door, said carelessly: "Lady Maitland's style of beauty attracts all sorts and conditions of men. She seems to have cast a spell over your friend, Mr. Heriot North."

A dark, ugly red spread slowly over the thin, spiteful face of Sir Trevor's elder daughter. She opened her mouth as though to speak, then shut it with a sudden snap, and between her closed teeth he heard her mutter: "I hate her! I hate her!"

As he strolled away towards Jack, who had asked him to join him in a game of billiards, he smiled grimly. "So her ladyship has not won over everybody by her charming ways! I wonder what her whispered conversation was about with that chap North? The girl at the lodge was mentioned, too. That woman is playing some game, I fancy, and one that requires delicate handling! I have not begun to play yet; and I fancy my game will surprise her ladyship not a little!"

That night, before Lady Maitland retired to rest, she smiled thoughtfully at herself in the mirror. The anxious look had left her eyes, and her expression had grown again sweet and child-like.

"I am glad I told him about the accident of that girl's voice being like mine," she murmured. "The fact of my giving the man money made him think I did it for the girl's sake!" She laughed softly. "While she imagines that I am shielding her Jack from harm! And if I should, at any time, find the creature growing too exorbitant—I have by me someone to deal with him—someone to——"

She stopped suddenly, and going to the drawer in the dainty escritoire, unlocked it, and drew out the bright, shining toy she had taken from her husband's dressing-table some time ago.

"Yes," she murmured, handling it lightly, "I have found someone to deal with him! Someone who will tell no tales!"

As the bright light fell upon the thing in her hand, a gentle noise at the door made her turn her head quickly, and thrust her hand behind her. Then, creeping softly, she suddenly flung the door wide open.

"Who's that?" she said sharply.

The corridor was in darkness, but dying away in the distance, she heard the quick rustle of a woman's dress.

FOURTEENTH CHAPTER.

The Man in the Room.

"Will you allow me to congratulate you upon your engagement, Miss Strange?" And Digby Scarlett leant upon the lodge-gates, and gazed into the lovely face of the lodge-keeper's adopted daughter.

"My engagement, Mr. Scarlett?" And Ivy Strange flushed hotly as she glanced at him with startled eyes.

"Yes," he said slowly. "I hear that you are engaged to Jack Maitland!"

"No, at least, I mean——" She stopped, and her colour grew even more deep than before.

"You mean what?" he asked. "Perhaps it is a conditional engagement, depending upon his good conduct?"

She raised her head with a sudden hauteur, and he smiled as he remembered where he had noted that movement before.

"It is nothing to do with that, Mr. Scarlett," she said simply. "But we are waiting until—until he has found out something for me—something connected with the past."

"The past?" he murmured; "whose past? Yours?"

She flushed. "Yes, mine; since you have probably heard that I am only a foundling," she said bitterly.

Digby Scarlett bit his lip. If this girl and her lover discovered what he very nearly suspected, then he would lose the greater part of his revenge! He must try to prevent that if possible.

"Then," he said, leaning forward; "until that time of discovery arrives you are free?"

"Practically—yes," she murmured absently.

Digby Scarlett smiled; and when he liked, his smile was very tender.

"I am glad you have told me that—Ivy," he said, in a low, intense voice; "because it gives me some excuse to tell you that I love you; and even were you a gutter-child, I would deem it an honour to call you mine. I would seek for no parents—only you would I want. Tell me," he went on, passionately; "is it quite hopeless?"

When he had first spoken, the girl had recoiled from him in sheer amazement, and her face in the dark gloom of the late November afternoon looked strangely pale.

"Oh, Mr. Scarlett!" she said, bewildered; "you must be mad to speak to me like that! I love no one but Jack; if ever I marry, he will be my husband!"

"Don't say that," he cried. "Listen to my love, dear! I am an older man than Jack. He is only a boy, and life holds many prizes for him; but for me, Ivy, child! the world contains only your fair, sweet flower self!"

"Don't speak to me like that!" she said, shrinking from him fearfully. "You are nothing to me; never can be anything; only Jack, I love, and hope to marry some day!"

He opened the gate and came towards her, his passion carrying him beyond the bounds of prudence.

"You shall love me! I shall supplant that boy's image from your mind!" he said hoarsely, and seizing hold of her, he attempted to draw her to him. "Kiss me—Ivy—darling—kiss me!"

She struggled in his arms like a bird newly snared!

"Jack! Jack!" she cried faintly, then, as Digby Scarlett was about to press his lips to hers, he was suddenly and effectually silenced by a well-directed blow from a strong young fist, that laid him full length on the gravel path.

"Jack! oh, Jack!" cried the girl again; but this time her cry was of joy, not fear; for her lover had come at her call.

"Who is the man?" he said hotly. "I only saw you, my darling, and the back of the brute's head."

Digby Scarlett rose slowly, and as Jack Maitland saw his face, he fell back with a cry of amazement. "You, my guest!" he murmured. "Scarlett, why have you betrayed my trust in human nature like this?" And the pain in the boy's voice made the elder man wince.

"I am sorry this has occurred," he said speaking thickly. "I understood from Miss Strange that she was not engaged to you, and I asked her to—to marry me, thinking that she was free."

"You knew I loved her!" said Jack passionately. "You were my friend—and I confided my feelings to you; then you take advantage of my absence to try and win her from me!"

Digby Scarlett shrugged his shoulders. "When you are my age, Maitland, such terms as 'friendship' and 'honour' will play second fiddle to the object a man means to win! I fell in love with Miss Strange, and, base as it may seem, my friendship for you faded in proportion to the strength of my love for her."

He paused, and his hand went up to his brow, where a red bruise was beginning to throb.

"I offer Miss Strange my apologies for frightening her. It shall not occur again! And you"—he turned to Jack, speaking in a clear, staccato voice; "you have the satisfaction of knowing that you have knocked down a man old enough to be your father!"

Jack whispered a few words to the trembling girl beside him, who glided into the lodge, leaving the two men alone.

"I will try to forget what has happened," Jack said, in his honest, manly way. "The whole affair is regrettable, and I feel that perhaps I was wrong to have left her so much alone lately. I am willing—if you are—to bury the hatchet!" He put out his hand, with a grave civility foreign to his usual debonair style. After a moment's hesitation Digby Scarlett touched it with his own.

"Done, Maitland!" he cried with a harsh laugh. "I will do my best to win back the confidence there was once between us. I will go to London to-morrow—perhaps, when I return we shall all be the same."

"I hope so," said Jack quietly. Had he not been instrumental in bringing this man to his father's house, he would have cut his hand off rather than held it out in a mockery of friendship to the man who had attempted to steal his lover from him!

With a few brief platitudes they separated, and when Digby Scarlett was by himself, he turned in the direction of Maitland Manor and the lodge. "I will make you pay for this, you young hound, as I made the other pay for his blow years ago!"

With a face distorted by passion, he shook his fist at the twinkling lights of the Manor, and a rasping laugh came from his lips:

"You shall pay for each blow! I hold all the strings in my hand, and when I pull them the dance will begin!"

The following day a telegram came from London calling the guest of the Manor away.

"I am almost ashamed to say how long I have trespassed upon your kindness and hospitality," he said genially. "And I shall never be able to repay it."

"Oh, come, Scarlett!" laughed the Squire; "we shall see you again, I hope. You are not going to let London swallow you up?"

Lady Maitland raised her eyes and fixed them on the guest she both hated and feared, waiting for his reply.

"Hardly," he replied. "I made arrangements yesterday to take the 'Rest' on a short lease; so the next time we meet it will be as neighbours; and I hope"—he turned to his hostess—"that Lady Maitland will honour me by giving a house-warming for a lonely bachelor!"

Their eyes met in a swift challenge, but Sir Trevor's wife smiled graciously, and said: "Certainly, Mr. Scarlett, I shall be very happy to help you."

The adieux were made—Jack was unaccountably absent when the guest drove off—and in a few hours time, Digby Scarlett found himself once more in London.

He went to a hotel instead of the club; and the next morning took a hansom and directed the driver to an address in a fashionable part of the West End, where apartments were let in the season.

The streets were murky and full, and a shabby-looking man following the hansom was unnoticed.

Digby Scarlett dismissed the cab, then slowly went up the steps and rang the bell.

"Is your mistress in?" he asked, when a trim maid opened the door.

"Yes, sir; will you walk in?" And she showed him into a handsomely-furnished room on the first-floor.

He looked round grimly. "Luck favours me to-day. I hardly expected to find the woman here, after all these years. I shall soon find out if she is the same one. I am glad I kept the address."

"Is it for apartments you have come, sir?" said a voice behind him, and, turning, he saw the landlady—a plump, grey-headed woman, with a kindly face, wrinkled like an apple, and a dignified manner.

He bowed. "Yes; or, rather, I have ventured to call especially to ask you about a lady who stayed with you some years ago. I am—her brother, just returned from America, and wish to trace her."

The woman frowned thoughtfully. "Well, sir, I have had many ladies staying with me since I began to let the rooms these last twenty years." Digby Scarlett smiled; then it might be the same woman after all.

"Unfortunately, madam," he said, "I am afraid you will remember only too well, when I tell you that my sister's name was Mrs. 'Grant.' She was here on her honeymoon, and a very sad thing happened to her husband. Perhaps you remember now?"

"Mrs. Grant, sir," she exclaimed quickly. "Oh, that poor, young thing! I shall never forget her as long as I live! That was an awful time for her!"

He nodded his head. "It was. What I wished to ask you was, how long she stayed with you—afterwards?"

"I don't remember exactly, sir. She was very ill, poor child. When she got better she went away with her little baby and her maid."

"Ah!" Digby Scarlett murmured thoughtfully. "Did she tell you where she was going?"

The woman shook her head. "No, sir. All I know is that they went to Southampton. After that, I never heard any more."

He took up his hat. "Then I won't trespass upon your time any longer, Mrs.—er——"

"Phillpot, sir!"

"Ah!" he murmured thoughtfully. "That is all I think I need ask you. By-the-way, what was the name of the maid?"

She shook her head. "I don't remember, sir. I know Mrs. Grant depended on her a lot."

Digby Scarlett thanked her, looked at the rooms, then left, after profuse apologies for detaining her so long. As he settled back in the hansom that was taking him to his hotel, he smiled with satisfaction. "I don't fancy I need look any further for proof. I know all I want to know."

As he went into the vestibule of the hotel, he did not notice a pair of hungry, burning eyes that followed him—the eyes of the shabby man who had run all the way to West Kensington behind his hansom, and followed him back again! There was a smile of grim determination on the worn face of the man as he turned from the hotel, and disappeared into the darkness with swift feet.

Digby Scarlett spent the day after his visit to West Kensington in choosing bric-a-brac for his new home, the "Rest," and when he returned to his hotel he felt tired and played out. As he was crossing the hall to make inquiries for letters, one of the attendants stopped him:

"If you please, sir, there is a gentleman waiting to see you. I showed 'im into your sitting-room; as 'e would wait."

"Did he leave a name?"

"No, sir. 'E said you would need no introduction."

The face of the man who listened changed colour slightly, and his lip trembled as he walked slowly up the wide staircase. Then he laughed. "I must be seeing phantoms to-night! There are hundreds of men who may want to speak to me. Why should I imagine such an impossibility?"

He paused suddenly and called the man to him. "Did you notice what the gentleman was like?"

"He was quite old, sir," replied the servant; "very bright eyes, and snow-white 'air."

Digby Scarlett laughed softly, as he turned away. "One of the estate people, I suppose, come to me to sign the papers about the 'Rest.'"

He went into his bedroom—it was adjoining his sitting-room—and unlocking his bag, took out a small, steel thing, which he slipped into his pocket. "One never knows," he muttered. "It may be useful."

He went to the door of his sitting-room, and, softly turning the handle, walked in. As he did so, a figure rose from a chair, and came forward slowly.

Then Digby Scarlett's fingers touched lightly the trigger of the "thing" in his pocket.

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Below you will find twelve sets of letters, each of which contains the name of a Railway Station in the United Kingdom (not necessarily using all the letters). You must write (in ink), in the space left for that purpose, the longest name you can make by rearranging the letters.

The name containing the greatest number of letters will be the correct solution. If, however, more than one such name can be made out of one set of letters, each will be counted correct.

All the names will be found in the Index to Railway Stations in the January (1903) edition of Bradshaw's Guide. Should you be unable to obtain a copy of this Guide, a reprint of the Index will be sent to you for three penny stamps on application to BRADSHAW'S GUIDE, 59 Fleet Street, London, E.C.; or ROOM EIGHT, "SHORT STORIES," 17 and 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

The first prize of £25 will be given to the competitor who fills in the greatest number of railway stations under the conditions stated. The second prize of £10 will go to the person who fills in the next greatest number, and the other prizes will be awarded in order of merit.

When you have filled in all the names you can find, take out this page and keep it by you. Don't on any account send it to us until the closing date is announced in "SHORT STORIES."

In the event of a tie a further set (or, if necessary, several further sets) of letters will be submitted to the tieing competitors until one wins the first prize outright.

Married in Haste.

Telling of a Strange Match that had a Happy Ending.

Containing the Incident Depicted on the Cover.

It was perfectly plain that there was going to be a wedding in the church of St. Simon—a large and imposing edifice in a well-known London district.

Th passers-by gathered this much from the fact that a strip of red carpet covered the steps from the church door to the pavement, and from the further fact that the clerk hovered uneasily before the main entrance to the building, quite evidently waiting for the wedding party.

Most men and all women love a wedding, therefore those who had time to spare, and no urgent business to do, took up their positions at the foot of the steps and waited patiently to obtain a glimpse of the smart folks they felt certain they would presently see.

Some of the bolder spirits even went further, and walked up the steps into the church itself, and, finding they were unmolested by the clerk, went with increased boldness up the nave and seated themselves in the pews that gaped invitingly empty for all comers.

It was strange, but no wedding guests filled any of the seats; the footsteps of these who had come into the church half afraid of their own boldness rang loudly round an empty building; and their eyes looked in vain for any of the ordinary signs of a brilliant sight.

Not a soul was to be seen, save the anxious-looking clerk, whose face seemed each moment to put on a fresh expression of care, and the curate who stood at the vestry door waiting to come forward and do his part in the ceremony.

"Oh! it's just going to be a sort of hole-in-a-corner wedding," one girl whispered to another. "I daresay the bride will simply be in her travelling dress, and not worth looking at. I wish now I hadn't come in!"

"Well! there certainly isn't going to be anything smart; I haven't seen a single soul who could by any stretch of imagination be called a guest, and—oh! my dear, who is that?" The chattering young lady broke off her sentence to end it with this abrupt question, as a strange and most incongruous figure passed through the church door and slouched slowly towards the chancel steps.

It was the figure of a man, whose downbent head and nervously twitching hands told of the shame and discomfort he was enduring. His face might once have been handsome, but want, misery—possibly even sin, had carved deep lines upon it.

His clothes were shabby to the point of raggedness; indeed, his coat was torn in many places, so that the lining showed through, and his boots were not only much the worse for wear, they were, practically, unwearable.

He wore no collar, his coat was buttoned to his chest, and a sorrier specimen of the human race could scarcely have been dreamt of than the miserable being who slouched up to the chancel steps, watched suspiciously and scornfully by the clerk, curiously by the onlookers, and with something of horror by the curate, who stepped quickly from his place and whispered a few words to the intruder.

The answer must have satisfied him, for he withdrew to the vestry door once more, but the puzzled horror on his face deepened, and he never removed his eyes from that strange, incongruous figure standing with drooping head and wretched mien beside the chancel rails.

"Who is he?" "What is he doing here?" "What does it mean?"

The questions buzzed to and fro amongst the congregation which, in the last few minutes, had grown imperceptibly larger. But no answer came to their questionings, and curiosity was reaching the point of fever-heat when the sound of a carriage stopping at the big west doors drew all eyes in that direction, and then only the sacredness of the building prevented the utterance of a loud exclamation of surprise from those who watched.

Of surprise—and of admiration—for, moving with stately steps across the threshold, their astonished eyes saw a tall and graceful woman, about whose shapely form fell the rich folds of a white satin gown, over whose head fell a veil of the most costly lace.

Her face was as white as the gown she wore, but its rare and exquisite beauty made those who saw it hold their breath for a second; whilst its expression of infinite sadness, of frozen horror, gave them a sudden sensation of taking part in some awful unknown catastrophe.

The bride's hand rested lightly on the arm of an old man, about whose thin lips an evil smile hovered, whose shifting, snake-like eyes shone with a baneful light—a light that became wickedly triumphant when he finally placed the beautiful woman in white by the side of the miserable, ragged form at the chancel rails, and drew back a pace himself, smiling still.

"She is going to marry him. He is the bridegroom," horrified whispers arose on every hand, and the face of the curate as he moved mechanically down from the vestry wore a look of disgusted amazement reflected on many another countenance.

The miserable bridegroom straightened himself a little as the opening words of the marriage service rang through the church, and his eyes lighted themselves deprecatingly towards the beautiful woman beside him. But no feature of her face moved, her eyes seemed fixed on vacancy; she might have have been an automaton for all the sign she gave of life or interest in the proceedings.

Her lips framed the words the clergyman bade her say, but the words themselves sounded dead and meaningless; she held out her hand to her bridegroom when she was told to do so, but it was like the hand of a dead woman.

Never once did her eyes glance in the direction of the man who was swearing to love and cherish her till Death should part them; only once did she give the slightest sign that she was a breathing, liying human being.

When the ring was placed upon her finger, those nearest her could see that a long shiver ran through her from head to foot, but after that she remained like a statue until the end of the service.

To those who looked on it was the most strange, the most painful ceremony they had ever witnessed, and a breathless longing to see the dénouement—to know more of the why and wherefore of the extraordinary proceedings led the whole congregation to go to the church door, in order to watch the driving away of the most incongruous couple they had ever seen joined together in holy matrimony.

If their curiosity was not satisfied, it was, at least, whetted tenfold.

Side by side the bride and bridegroom walked down the steps—side by side, but no more. Her hand did not rest upon his arm, she did not look towards him, and his head was bent downwards more shamefacedly than before.

The carriage waited beside the kerb—a carriage and pair, whose footman stood decorously holding the door open, his face expressing nothing but the absolute passivity of a well-trained servant.

The old man with the evil face, who had given the bride away, followed the newly-wedded pair down the steps, but at a discreet distance, and it was noticed that his repulsive countenance was still wreathed in smiles.

At the foot of the steps the bride paused, and a faint flush dyed the deadly whiteness of her face, as she suddenly held out her right hand towards the man so lately made her husband.

"Take this," she whispered, her words inaudible to those standing near, "I have done—as I said—take this—and let me never—see your face again."

From her hand to his something passed, and those nearest declared it was a heavy purse, and that for an instant the man had hesitated, as though intending to refuse it. Then his fingers closed over it, an extraordinary expression passed over his face—an expression whether of passionate love or bitter hate it was impossible to say.

He took one quick step towards his bride, and in a voice as low as hers had been, but vibrating with a force and passion hers had lacked, he murmured:

"You shall never see my face till I am fit to claim——"

His sentence remained unended. She drew herself away from him, and her eyes swept over his wretched figure with scathing scorn in their depths.

"Let me pass," she said slowly and clearly, and, drawing herself to her full height, she brushed past him with a superb gesture of disdain, and entered her carriage.

"Home," she said to the footman. The door was banged to, the footman sprang upon the box, the carriage drove quickly away, leaving the bridegroom and the old man with the evil face standing side by side upon the pavement.

"This is the best day's work you ever did," the old man said with a sneer; "and this would not have been done, except for me."

"Except for you!" The other's face grew livid, his eyes burnt fiercely. "You have ruined her life as well as mine; and, see here, I will not touch her money—not a farthing—not a halfpenny of it! She—is an angel of light—an angel of light, I tell you, and some day—some day——"

A low, mocking laugh from the old man checked his utterance. With an oath he flung the purse he held at the mocker's feet, and repeating in a low voice:

"Some day—you will see!" He broke his way through the crowd, and hurried rapidly down the street till he was lost to sight.

The old man stooped, and his laugh rang out again, as he picked up the fallen purse.

"I shall see, shall I, my noble son? A fool for your pains, as usual, Maurice Dranmore—a fool for your pains."

Then, with a shrug of the shoulders, and that snake-like smile hovering round his lips, he jumped into a waiting cab, and was driven rapidly away. The younger man wasted no time in escaping from the gaze of the gaping crowd.

* * * * * * *

In the great house which was the home of Dorothy Swayne, the heiress, there was an unusual stir and bustle; much shaking of the head, and many whisperings.

For many days rumour had been ripe that their beloved mistress was going to be married, but an atmosphere of mystery and strangeness had hung round all these rumours, and no one had been able to ascertain the exact truth upon the subject.

With the exception of a scapegrace brother, Miss Swayne had no near relations, nor anyone to call her to account for her actions; but her faithful servants had seen, with growing uneasiness, that their young mistress was in trouble—terrible, deadly trouble—and her white face and anguished eyes gave them many a heartache.

And now, at last, a climax had come.

Arrayed in bridal white, she had this morning driven away in her own carriage, accompanied by a certain Mr. Dranmore, whom, they all knew, she hated and despised, an old man who had been her father's friend, but never hers.

The whole household then was agog with excitement—an excitement but little diminished when, barely an hour after her departure, Miss Swayne returned—alone.

"Tell all the servants I wish to speak to them in the library," she said to the butler, as she swept across the hall in her trailing white draperies—her face as white as they—"bring them all there at once." And when her astonished household hastily obeyed her summons they found her standing beside the library table, stately and tall as a great white lily, her face calm and still as though carved in stone.

"I wish to tell you," she said steadily, "that I have been married this morning." All eyes stole furtively to the plain gold ring on her left hand—a gasp of intense surprise burst from all lips, "I have been married to Mr. Dranmore's son—Mr. Maurice Dranmore."

Amazement, horror, dismay chased each other over every face in the room, but the quiet voice went on: "But, excepting that I have changed my name, nothing else will be changed. I shall live here as before—alone. I have parted with—my husband on the church steps. I do not expect ever to see him again. I—married him for a reason of great importance; he is my husband in name only."

That was all! The household learnt no more, and surmise and conjecture ran riot in housekeeper's room and servants' hall.

"Why—why—why had their mistress done this thing?" That was the perpetual question.

"Why?"

On that same afternoon the newly-made wife—Dorothy Dranmore—her white robes removed and hidden away from her sight as she hoped for ever, dressed herself in the simplest of black gowns, and went out alone. Her destination was very far indeed from her own stately mansion, and the cabman who drove her thither lifted his eyebrows in surprise when she bade him stop at last before a mean house in a yet meaner street.

"Wait for me," she said, "I shall not be long;" and she passed through the open door of the building and up a flight of broken, rickety stairs.

At the very top she paused, and, drawing a long breath, knocked on the door of a room—entering it immediately.

Beside the table in the centre sat a young man, his head buried in his hands—his white face indicative of the utmost dejection.

At the sound of the opening door he started violently and shivered from head to foot—but when he saw the tall, beautiful woman come in alone he rose quickly to his feet with the low ejaculation,

"Sis? Is it you? Why have you come to my beastly hiding-place? Why?"

She put her hand gently on his arm, and some of the frozen misery that had been in her face all day died out of it.

"I have come," she said, "to—bring you this—to tell you it is all right—that you are a free man—and safe." And as she spoke she handed to him a slip of paper.

"A free man? Safe? All right." He repeated her words heavily, the colour coming and going on his fair, weak face. "What do you mean? You were always cleverer than I, sis. You oughtn't to have had such a wretched fool for a brother."

"Hush, dear." Her voice was very gentle. "Read that paper. See—it is all right;" and she unfolded the paper she had given him, and held it before his eyes. He looked at it vacantly for a moment, then, suddenly a light leapt into his face.

"I—I can't understand!" he exclaimed brokenly, "It—it seems plain enough, but I can't understand. That's old Dranmore's writing,—but—but he's as hard as nails—they say he never forgives, and—and Dorothy I did forge his name—it's no use pretending I didn't. I forged—and—embezzled. Being his confidential clerk made it so—so jolly easy,—and the temptation was more than I could stand." He looked weakly up at his sister, and her lips quivered.

"But if you wanted money why not have come to me? My godfather gave me wealth,—and—you know, Dick,—you know I would have given you all you needed."

The young man hung his head.

"It—it was racing debts, sis,—gambling debts that you would have hated. I—I could not bear to let you know,—and old Dranmore gave so much into my hands that—the temptation was too much. I meant to pay him back,—but I knew he would never forgive if he once found out,—and I can't understand—this."

He indicated the paper he held, on which were written the words:

"On my most solemn word of honour I swear that I will not prosecute Richard Swayne, nor in any way attempt to punish him for forgery and embezzlement. This I swear to in recognition of Dorothy Swayne's action on my son's behalf.

"Signed, Joseph Dranmore."

"What have you done for old Dranmore's son?" Dorothy's brother looked up into her face with bewildered eyes.

"I—have married him," she said shortly.

"Married him? Why—his father had cast him off; he had pretty well gone to the dogs; he was—in the workhouse or something. You can't have married him, sis; why did you do it? Why did——"

"I did it for you," she answered gravely. "Hush—listen—try to understand, Dick. Mr. Dranmore came to tell me of what—you had done; he threatened the utmost penalty the law could inflict—and I pleaded for you in vain. Then—he is a fiend, Dick—an utter fiend—he laughed suddenly, and said he would let you off, pardon you absolutely—on one condition. If I would agree to marry his son—Maurice Dranmore—you should be free."

"Why did you not tell me? I would never have let you sacrifice yourself," the young man exclaimed indignantly.

A sorrowful look overspread his sister's face. How could she tell him that with her knowledge of his innately weak character? She had been certain that penal servitude would have meant his utter ruin.

"I—told no one," she said gently, "Mr. Dranmore stipulated that I should marry his son as he was, dressed in his old clothes, exactly in the miserable condition in which he seems to have been living. He sank to be a sort of cab tout I think—he looks the most utterly wretched being." Her face grew white as she remembered that it was her husband of whom she spoke, and she paused for a moment—then went on bravely.

"I was to be in ordinary bridal dress—that was part of the bond—and I was to give the man money when I had married him—but the marriage was an absolute necessity. Without that Mr. Dranmore entirely refused to forgive you. I—I have done it, Dick. I have married Maurice Dranmore. See—that is his ring upon my finger. I—am—his—wife. We parted at the church door, and God grant, oh! God grant I may never see his face again."

Her brother looked at her in speechless wonder, a gratitude that was beyond words lighting up his face.

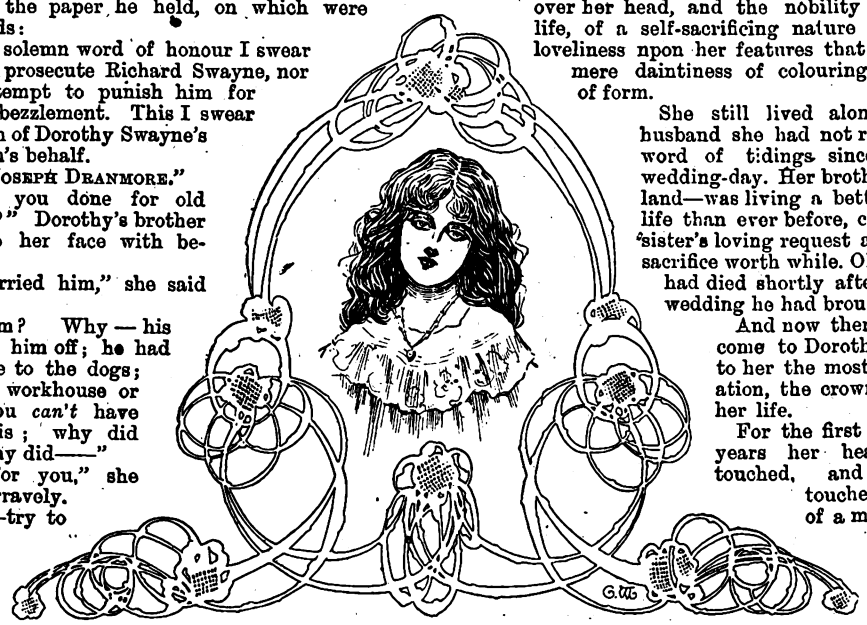
"No—don't thank me," she said, a little sob breaking her voice. "I—did what I thought was right, and now, Dick—oh! Dick, try to make my sacrifice worth while. Be a good man and a strong one. Let me know that my action was not in vain. Make my sacrifice worth while!"

* * * * * *

Ten years had slipped away since Dorothy Swayne had, under such unwonted circumstances, married Maurice Dranmore.

The nine days' wonder of it had quickly subsided, and Dorothy's world had learnt to look upon her as a married lady—or rather perhaps as a widow.

If she had been beautiful at twenty-five, she was far more beautiful now that thirty-five summers had passed over her head, and the nobility of an unselfish life, of a self-sacrificing nature had stamped a loveliness upon her features that was far beyond mere daintiness of colouring or the beauty of form.



She still lived alone, and of her husband she had not received a single word of tidings since that strange wedding-day. Her brother—in a distant land—was living a better and manlier life than ever before, carrying out his sister's loving request and making her sacrifice worth while. Old Mr. Dranmore had died shortly after the infamous wedding he had brought about.

And now there had suddenly come to Dorothy what seemed to her the most terrible temptation, the crowning anguish of her life.

For the first time in all the years her heart had been touched, and more than touched by the homage of a man who for the last few months had been constantly at her sdie.

"From the colonies," was vaguely said of him, but his name—Tom Smith—gave very little clue as to his identity or antecedents. Only Dorothy knew that she cared neither who nor what he was; that the sound of his footstep could set her pulses throbbing; that his deep voice would send a thrill through her heart; that the glance of his dark eyes made her instinctively lower her own.

The strength of her own feelings terrified her; but strive as she would, she could not wholly quench the love that was springing up in her own heart in answer to the love that looked out of the stranger's eyes.

"I must tell him the truth," she said to herself one evening, wringing her hands together; "he thinks I am a widow—and free; I must tell him the truth—and—break my own heart!"

Two hours later she was seated by his side in the conservatory of a house of mutual friends, and in the fragrant stillness it seemed to her that she could hear all her pulses throbbing whilst his gaze scanned her face.

"I—I have something to tell you," she said abruptly, feeling that she must speak at once and end the agony she endured. "I—I——"

"And I have something to tell you," he broke in quickly, "something which I have wanted to tell you for days, for weeks, for——"

"Wait, wait," she cried, springing to her feet; "you must hear me first. I ought to have spoken before; it was wrong of me. I have been letting you be my friend under false pretences,—I—am not what I seem; I am a married woman, and my husband is still alive."

She panted out the words breathlessly, then waited in a very anguish of despair for his answer, not daring to lift her eyes to his face; longing, yet dreading to hear his voice. When she heard it at last its tenderness sent a long shiver through her frame.

"And if you were free—could you have—cared for me?"

"Ah! don't," she exclaimed; "don't tempt me—don't hurt me, it——"

"Hurt you?" His arms went suddenly round her, she was drawn close against his breast, his kisses rained on her face. "Hurt you—my wife—my wife!"

"Oh! don't," she sobbed, struggling a little in his arms, but he still held her closely, whispering:

"Your husband is alive, my sweet; he is here—here—here! My name is Maurice Dranmore, not Tom Smith. When I married you—for your brother's sake, and utterly against my will—I was not worthy to kiss your feet. But your angel face, your heavenly goodness awoke what good there was in me.

"I have worked, and toiled, and struggled to be fit for you, and in all the long, long years I have thought of you—only you—and loved you more every day. And now—I have come to ask you to take me, truly and in earnest, 'till Death us do part,'—my wife!"

The face that Dorothy lifted to his was wet with tears, but what he saw there satisfied him, for a smile flashed into his eyes—"Married in haste, sweetheart," he murmured, "but with God's good help I will see to it that you do not repent at leisure."

Hotel Clerk: "This is a bad half-crown." Commercial: "All right; I had a bad night."

There are young men who cannot hold a skein of wool for their mothers without wincing, but who will hold between eight and nine stone of a neighbouring family for the best part of the evening with a patience and docility that are certainly phenomenal.

A small landed proprietor was taking a drive with his daughter and his intended son-in-law for the purpose of showing the latter round the estate. The coachman drove at a smart pace. "John," whispered his master in his ear, "don't drive so fast, the estate will look so small."

All attempts in the "Buried Stations" Competition should reach this office not later than by first post on Thursday (June 18th). Envelopes must be addressed according to the instructions given last week.

Another list of letters in the Juggled Letters Competition will be found on page 777. Competitors are asked to read the conditions carefully; this will prevent their raising unnecessary queries. No questions regarding the competition will be answered either personally or through the post, but if any point of general interest is raised it will be dealt with in this column.

A comprehensive summary of the chapters of our new serial, "The Bond Between," is published on the first page, so that new readers can start it now. I would certainly recommend anyone who has not begun to read it to do so without further delay.

Any single or widowed lady among my readers—between the ages of seventeen and seventy—who is in want of a husband, should get a copy of this week's Pearson's Weekly, in which she will see full particulars as to how she can win Mr. P. Doubleyou, who is being offered as a prize. The conditions are not very hard to fulfil. In addition to a husband the fortunate winner will have her wedding dress and complete trousseau provided for her by Pearson's Weekly, All expenses attached to the wedding itself and a month's honeymoon will also be paid. Ladies should get a copy of Pearson's Weekly now and see what they have to do.

I hope my readers have not overlooked my request that they should inclose some stamps for the Fresh Air Fund with their attempts in the "Buried Stations" Competition. If each competitor sends in only two or three stamps it will mean a considerable increase to the Fund. Only ninepence is required to give one child a happy day. All the expenses of management are borne equally by C. Arthur Pearson Ltd. and the Ragged School Union, and every penny of the money subscribed by readers goes in paying the expenses of the children's own outings.

Some readers may perhaps like to get up an entertainment, hold a bazaar, or do something else by which to raise money for the Fund if they cannot afford to give out of their own pockets as much as they would wish. Collecting forms will be sent on application to anyone who desires them. All amounts will be acknowledged in Pearson's Weekly, and should be sent to the Hon. Sec. Fresh Air Fund, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., to whom all communications regarding the Fund should be addressed.

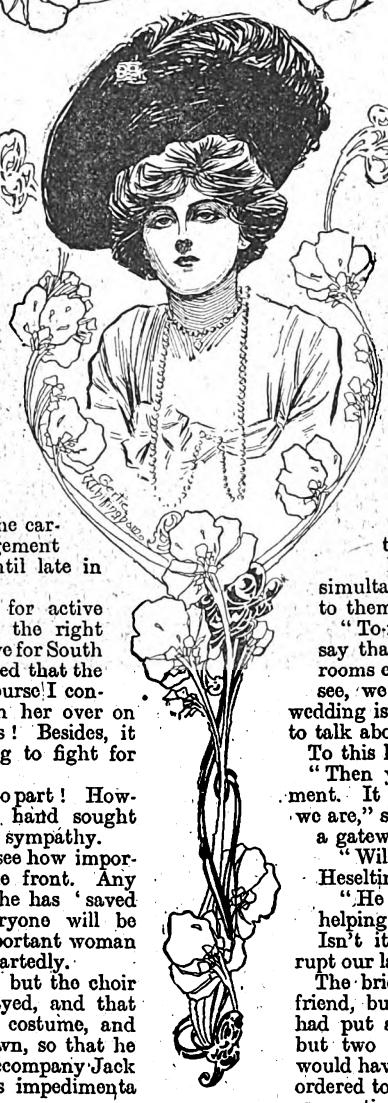
ASSISTING AT A HOLOCAUST.



Telling of a Girl's Disillusionment.

"So sweet of you to come, darling," and Ada Sutton threw her arms round the neck of her friend as she stepped from the train to the platform.

"Which end is the luggage in? Here, Williams," and she beckoned the footman towards her, "see to Miss Heseltine's boxes. Come along!" and she linked her arm within that of her schoolday companion, giving her a hug as she did so.

"But how sudden it is!" began Mary Heseltine as soon as they were seated in the carriage. "When you told me of the engagement you said the marriage would not be until late in the year."

"Yes, but Jack has been called up for active service. I don't know whether that is the right expression, but at all events he has to leave for South Africa within the next few days. He asked that the marriage might take place at once. Of course I consented. My mother objected, but I won her over on the question of expense. See what it saves! Besides, it is my duty to marry him when he is going to fight for his country!"

"Oh, Ada, how heartbreaking it will be to part! However will you say 'good-bye'?" Her hand sought that of her friend and gripped it in warm sympathy.

"Yes, that will have to be faced, but see how important I shall be, having a husband at the front. Any day I may open the paper and find that he has 'saved the situation,' or got the V.C. Everyone will be coming to see me. I shall be the most important woman in Broadmere!" She rattled on light-heartedly.

"The wedding will be as quiet as quiet, but the choir will be there, the 'Wedding March' played, and that kind of thing. I shall wear a travelling costume, and the short honeymoon will be spent in town, so that he can start at a moment's notice. I shall accompany Jack round the stores while he is getting his impedimenta together. Isn't it exciting?"

Mary Heseltine looked at the bright girl who took things so lightly. She was an emotional little creature with light, fluffy hair, very affectionate, but of no depth of character. It pained her to think that she should regard so serious a matter in the light her words implied.

"Of course, you always promised that you would be my bridesmaid," she continued, "so I wrote to you at once. His sister will be the other. I don't think you will like her—I don't, she is always so grave. Jack calls me optimistic. I suppose she is pessimistic—is that the word? But I am monopolising the conversation. Have you no news, Mary? When are you going to be married?"

Mary Heseltine's face reddened with a happy, rosy blush, and the light of joy was in her eyes instantly, as she turned them on her friend with a meaning glance.

"Oh, Mary!" cried her friend excitedly. "Is it——"

She nodded quickly.

"Bless you!" exclaimed her companion. "I am so pleased. Tell me all about it. No, there is not time now, for we are nearly home, but to-night we shall have a long, long talk. Your room is next to mine. I arranged that just so that we might have a regular old school night again, like the good old times. Do you remember the little bedroom we shared at St. Fursey's?"

"And how we got impositions for sitting up late?" put in the other.

The two girls laughed merrily over their escapades. "What a lot we shall have to talk about!" they exclaimed simultaneously, as the old memories came back to them instinct with life.

"To-night, as soon as dinner is over, I will say that you look tired, then we can get to our rooms early," suggested the bride-elect. "You see, we shall have no time to-morrow, for the wedding is at eleven o'clock, and there is so much to talk about."

To this her friend readily consented.

"Then you can tell me all about your engagement. It will be so nice to talk over the fire. Here we are," she broke off, as the carriage swept through a gateway into an avenue of trees.

"Will he be here to-night?" inquired Mary Heseltine.

"He? No. He is at the barracks to-day, helping to get things ready for the start. Isn't it fortunate? There is nothing to interrupt our last evening together."

The bridesmaid smiled. She was fond of her friend, but her thoughts went to the man who had put a half hoop diamond ring on her finger but two days ago. She wondered whether she would have talked so lightly if her lover had been ordered to South Africa. She smiled at the mere suggestion, and thanked Providence that Bertie Crowhall was a civilian, and not likely to be ordered away on the eve of his wedding.

As arranged, the two girls retired early that night. Very soon after going up there was a tap at Ada's door, and her friend entered in her dressing-gown, eager to exchange confidences in regard to their respective lovers.

"What a lovely fire! Why, Ada, you will be roasted!"

"Welcome to the Holocaust!" she replied.

"A what?" inquired her friend.

"A holocaust—that is the word, I know, for I made sure by looking in the dictionary."

"Who is the victim?" she laughingly asked as she drew a chair up to the fire.

"That is yet to be disclosed. In fact, there are awful disclosures to be made, but to-night closes Act I. in my life."

By her side was a box, which she proceeded to unlock with an assumed air of mystery.

"Now we shall have a burning!" she exclaimed as she threw back the lid, disclosing the contents to Mary's gaze. "We will take them in order," she began, picking up a sprig of white heather. "It has kept remarkably well. I met him in the Highlands two years ago, and he gave me that at parting. He was a nice young fellow, but too dour, as the Scottish call it, with a regular Highlander's temper.

"He proposed to me on Mount Nevis—Ben Nevis I mean—and I half accepted him. Indeed we were almost engaged, but he went abroad and—well there is no fun in being engaged to a man you never see. A man abroad is always more or less a myth—people don't believe in them. Here are some of his letters. Letters and white heather into the fire you go," and she dropped a little bundle into the flames.

"You seem to have a lot of letters in that box," remarked the other girl.

"Yes there must be some hundreds. There are some I received when I was at St. Fursey's with you and others so late as last week, but all must be burnt to-night. Do you remember Tom Ashe, the vicar's son? He gave me that little silver whistle when I was at school. We wrote stocks of letters to each other. Poor Tom, he was killed somewhere in India—Afghanistan, or I believe I should have married him. He sent me that photograph from Delhi, and those flowers from Simla."

She went on with her history, steadily dropping various keepsakes and mementoes among the glowing coals, while her friend sat and listened.

"Don't you think this is rather horrid, telling me all about these men?" said Mary Heseltine at length. "Their inmost thoughts appear to me to be in a way sacred, and some of the writers are dead."

"You wretched moralist. Are you not interested?"

"Yes, certainly, but it seems mean, somehow, to tell another of their love affairs."

"Of course, Mary. I am only telling you, besides I am destroying all clues, as they say in the penny dreadfuls. You are my confessor—we all need one at times."

"Go on then," smiled her friend.

"I believe you are impatient to tell me your affair—own up," she said, with mock sternness.

"No, my news can wait. It's not so important as all that."

"Very well, then, we will go on. Mind, I am dying to hear all about your engagement, but we must do one thing at a time, and my confession is not yet made. This little Prayer-book in silver and ivory was given to me by a former curate here. He was really a good fellow, but so awfully conscientious that I felt a great sinner in his presence. It was a dull time—just after I left school. I took up with church work. We were great friends until——"

"Don't burn the Prayer-book. It seems sacrilege," interrupted the maid of honour, putting out her hand in protest.

"Very well, if you will take it, but I cannot retain it in my possession. Tear out the flyleaf; we will at least burn that. I was saying he went off to London, and is working somewhere in the slums now. Here is the last note he ever wrote me. I am afraid I treated him badly, but he was really too good, and, foolish man, he thought I was a saint. Men are stupid where we are concerned."

She paused as she gazed into her treasure box at the mixed collection of photographs, faded flowers, locks of hair, buttons of different regiments and such like.

"I call them the broken fragments of love's dream."

"Or memorials of my flirtations," suggested Mary.

"Oh, I was really in earnest with a number of these men. I wonder why they loved me," she mused. "But you must all go the same way. It will never do to begin married life with all these in my possession. I wonder what Jack would say if he knew."

She hastily collected a number of photographs.

Suddenly her companion, who was looking over her shoulder into the box, gave a start, and with an effort suppressed a cry.

"Good Heavens, Mary! What a fright you gave me. Whatever is the matter?" asked the bride of the morrow.

"I am cold." Her lips were white, and she spoke slowly.

"Why, you are shivering; those bundles of letters are putting the fire out—they actually refuse to burn. Come nearer. I will put some more coal on. Now you will be all right with this shawl round you. That journey of yours must have been very trying."

She was so intent on the box that she did not notice the dark shadows that had come over the eyes of her friend, or that she still shivered in spite of the wrap.

Poor Mary Heseltine. The box had proved fatal to her, there being turned out for the holocaust was a package of lettersf rom the man she loved. She knew the handwriting too well to be mistaken, besides there were various pictures of his.

Her first impulse was to demand an explanation from Ada. The ink looked as fresh as if it had been written the day before, but her face was innocent of deception.

"How long is it since he was one of them?" she asked with an effort that cost her a great deal.

Still her friend did not notice the change in her voice, and answered casually. "Oh, he held on right up to the last. That reminds me, there is a note from him in my sealskin pocket in which he speaks about being heart-broken, the stars going out, or the moon, I forget which—it may be the sun, and that sort of thing. She went to a wardrobe in search of the missing epistle.

"How fortunate it was that I thought of it," she added. "Yes"—opening it—"this is dated the third and to-day is the eighth. Pretty near, isn't it? But he would not take 'No' for answer, and sent this letter."

Mary thought of one now in her own pocket from the same man that she had read and re-read many times that day.

"Yes, young Crowhall was very persistent. Do you know he actually proposed again when he knew that I was engaged to Jack. When I snubbed him he sent me this note," and she took another from the box. "This came three days ago, from which it would appear he intended to warm up some old broth. You know him. Don't you remember at Lady Grandtown's ball he was with my brother Dick, and you remarked that he was very nice looking?"

Mary Heseltine nodded. She was watching the flames curling about the blackened mass of correspondence that held out so long against annihilation. Her hands were clasped about her knees and she was thinking.

"Wouldn't Bertie Crowhall do for you?" asked her friend laughingly.

She shook her head sadly. "Not now," she replied quickly.

"Oh, I was forgetting. Of course you must tell me all about your engagement, dear. How selfish I am—all this time I have been thinking about myself. Now into the fire with the remainder of love's fragments," and she tumbled the relics into the flames, giving the box a bang to clear out the dust. "That is over. Now, dear, tell me about your romance."

"There is nothing to tell, Ada. You know I was always fond of a joke. There is no engagement."

Carrots and Turnips.

The Romance of a Red-haired Girl.

"Carrots!"

The young girl thus appealed to turned her laughing brown eyes to her brother, who, with his mouth half-full of bread and butter, seemed determined on dividing his attention equally between his elder sister and his breakfast.

Vera Mapleson, the Squire's daughter, was a beautiful girl, but Nature had endowed her with hair of that peculiar shade which is generally known as Titian red; in ordinary lights it appeared to be red, of a bronze-red hue, but if the sun shone on its silky masses it looked like burnished gold.

Vera was lucky in so far that she made her entrance into Society when this coloured hair was in vogue, and she created quite a sensation that the men raved about her, while women rather disdainfully whispered that they could not see what gentlemen found to admire so much in that "carroty-haired Miss Mapleson!"

Her schoolboy brother, young Teddy, had given her the nickname of Carrots. Vera had been away on a month's visit, and had only returned the previous evening. The family were dawdling over breakfast this morning.

"Carrots!" Teddy repeated.

"Teddy!"

"Yes, mater, darling, what is it?"

Gentle Mrs. Mapleson tried to appear as severe as she could.

"Naughty boy, you know I do not like you to call your sister by that vulgar appellation of Carrots."

"But, mater, you know Vera does not mind; it suits her to a T. It is all very fine for the London swells who make love to her to call her hair Venetian gold and Titian red, and all that twaddle, but her hair is red and all aglow, and no mistake!"

"Eat your breakfast, sir, and stop that good-for-nothing tongue of yours," broke in Squire Mapleson from behind a sheet of the Times.

So Teddy obediently fell to with a schoolboy's healthy appetite.

"Well, Teddy," smiled Vera, "you seem to be full of some wonderful news; out with it, or it will certainly choke you!"

"Have you seen the new head-gardener?"

"No, how could I have seen him?"

"Well, he is a ripper! I do not know where on earth the governor unearthed him, but he is out-and-out the best fellow I have ever come across. He and I just hit it off capitally together. We are such chums!"

"Teddy, my dear boy, I do not think the gardener is exactly the sort of companion Squire Mapleson's son should choose," and again his mother shook her head.

"Mater, dearest, you do not know what a fine fellow he is, tip-top for the orchid and grape-houses, and he looks every inch as much of a gentleman as any of those London beaux who come after Carrots."

"Teddy!"

"All right, old girl. I won't mention those fellows again if it bothers you. But after breakfast you might just come with me and I'll introduce you to my friend the gardener."

"You absurd boy," laughed the Squire. "Is it likely that your sister is going to be introduced to the gardener!"

"But he is one in a thousand, he tells such tales and yarns. He can construct a boat or anything he likes, he is so clever; just now he is helping me to run up a Robinson Crusoe hut in the old chestnut tree."

"George, do you think it wise that Teddy should be so much in the society of this rough, common man?"

"Mater, he is not rough or common, he might be a prince of the blood royal!" indignantly protested Teddy.

"My dear," answered the Squire, "I do not think you need worry over Teddy, I had the highest references with this man before I engaged him!"

"Indeed, and from whom?"

"Well, from rather an unexpected quarter—from Lord Yvor."

"Lord Yvor! Why, he has not been seen or heard of for over ten years, I believe."

"Lord Yvor is living abroad, he has bought a large place in some remote part of Brittany, and this gardener who has such a splendid testimonial from him, has been in his service for many years. Wishing to return to England, and seeing my advertisement for a head-gardener, he got his master to recommend him. So you see this Phœnix of Teddy's is all right."

"Yes, and just fancy, he has travelled about such lots as Lord Yvor's confidential man, and he seems to know every part of the globe. To hear him talk is just like reading a book of thrilling adventures. Carrots, old girl, you would just rave about him!"

Vera laughed.

"Teddy, dear, I am not made of the same inflammatory stuff as you are. I do not catch fire as easily as you do!"

"Well, you ought to with that coloured hair!"

"Teddy," said the Squire, "give over cheeking your sister. You had better tell your mother and Vera the name of your precious paragon, that will take every spice of romance out of the matter."

"Oh, look here, father, that is mean of you," exclaimed the lad dolefully. "His name is the one thing about him I cannot get over, it does not suit him one bit; it ought to be Lancelot, or Percival, or——"

"Yes, but unfortunately," broke in the Squire, with a loud laugh, "it happens to be Turnips!"

"Turnips!" said Vera, "well, there is nothing like having a name to suit one's vocation. Never mind, Ted, the immortal Shakespeare has said 'What's in a name?'"

Just then the door burst open, and a lovely child entered; she was the very counterpart of Vera in a miniature way; indeed, little Flossie's rippling curls were so like in colour to her elder sister's hair that Teddy was wont to say she would have to be called Carrots the Second!

The child was soon ensconced on Vera's lap hugging her sister, and bestowing on her all the marks of her exuberant affection.

"Carrots," piped Flossie in her clear child's treble, "you must come to the stables to see my new doggie. Father gave it to me, and the gardener is looking after it for me."

"What, Flossie, are you gone on that gardener as much as Teddy is?"

"He's a darling, I love him and mean to marry him when I am grown up," the child said gravely.

Her little speech was greeted with peals of laughter from her father and brother. Mrs. Mapleson looked absolutely horrified.

"Child, you must not say such things; children should not talk about what they do not understand."

Half an hour later Vera, with Flossie clinging to her hand and Teddy hanging on her arm, bent her steps towards the stables to go and inspect the new dog. Suddenly both children relinquished hold of their sister and disappeared behind the shrubbery, from which they promptly issued triumphantly dragging forward the gardener.

Tall, squarely built, and remarkably good-looking, he seemed to bear himself as proudly in his working garb as if he were king of the realm.

Little Flossie had taken hold of one of his hands and was patting it affectionately, looking up trustingly into his face. But he gently disengaged himself from the clinging, childish grasp.

"Take care, Miss Flossie, you will soil your pretty white frock, my hands are covered with mould, I have just been repotting plants in the glasshouses."

"Never mind, Turnips, dear," she replied, "earth is not dirty! Look," the child went on, "this is my sister Vera—Carrots, Teddy and I call her, 'cause she's got red hair like me. Is she not beautiful?"

The gardener doffed his cap respectfully, and made of course no answer to Flossie's burst of admiration for her sister.

"You have been very kind to my brother and little sister," Vera said, with one of those beautiful smiles of hers which in Society led captive so many hearts, but here of course it was different—this man was only the gardener, a common man in her father's employment.

"Didn't I tell you my sister was the most queenly beauty that ever walked the earth?" whispered Teddy. "What do you think of her?"

The gardener answered the boy in a low voice:

"She is the master's daughter, and in our humble sphere, Master Teddy, we have no right either to blame or to admire the quality. Miss Flossie wants to see her dog, I think," and, preceded by the child, who danced gleefully in front of him, he disappeared inside the stables.

"Well, Carrots, is he not a splendid fellow?"

"He seems quite a superior sort of person, far above his station. I suppose it is his constant companionship and travelling about with Lord Yvor which has given him a sort of genteel varnish; but I think it is bad for any of that sort of class to lift them from their proper level, it only makes them feel like fish out of water."

And Vera turned away without casting another thought on the gardener.

Vera had always been the idol of her young brother and little sister, and she felt a certain degree of unconscious irritation and jealousy against this man, a stranger, and holding such a humble station in her father's household, who had thus twined himself round the hearts of those two children, where hitherto she had reigned in undisputed sway.

Vera had been back three weeks when one afternoon she went in quest of her little sister; failing to find her in the house, Vera gave up her search in despair, and made up her mind rather reluctantly to take a solitary stroll by the banks of the tiny river, which wound in and out of the woods at the far end of the domain.

It was a lovely, picturesque walk, with the trees growing so thick that the spot was always shady, no matter how torrid the sun's scorching rays might be, and the placid silver stream slowly flowed onwards, with its incessant musical murmur, and the birds warbled their love-songs overhead.

As Vera neared a favourite nook of hers at the foot of a gnarled, spreading old tree, amidst whose drooping branches climbed in a sort of leafy arbour the rambling trails of the wild, sweet-smelling clematis, she paused as she heard the sound of voices, and peeping through the foliage she beheld a group which made her heart beat with an angry pulsation.

On the green sward, at the foot of the tree, sat the head-gardener, with little Flossie on his knee. The child had her hand clasped in his, while she gazed up confidingly into his face, and listened enraptured to the fairy-tale he was telling her.

"And so Rosalind married the Prince, and they lived happy ever after. There, Miss Flossie, is not that a pretty story?"

Vera just heard the concluding phrase. Flossie put up her hand and patted his cheek with a loving caress.

"Yes, dear, dear Turnips, it is a lovely story, like everything which you tell me. And fairy tales always end so, they marry and live happy. I mean to marry, to live happy ever after!"

"Do you indeed, Miss Flossie?"

"Yes, when I grow up I am going to marry you, 'cause I love you." And with a pretty, impulsive gesture she flung her arms around his neck, and laid her pretty soft cheek against his.

He stooped and fondly kissed her.

"Little darling, you have not yet been spoilt by the falsehood and hypocrisies of Society; your pure, childish love is true and genuine."

But at this moment Vera felt she could control her feelings no longer—to see this common fellow, one of her father's menials, actually kissing her baby sister, made her proud nature throb in a perfect passion of anger. Pushing back the leafy curtain and advancing with a flushed face, she snatched the child from the gardener's arms.

"You forget yourself strangely, daring to take such unheard of liberties with your master's daughter!"

The cold, hard words seemed to strike him like a pitiless blow; he rose to his feet, a crimson hue overspreading his whole swarthy face.

"I beg your pardon, miss, I did not know I was committing such a crime!"

"This must never occur again," Vera peremptorily commanded in her haughty tones.

"Naughty Carrots!" piped Flossie, with a tiny reproving finger held up. "I won't have you scold Turnips, he is a darling, and I like him to kiss me!"

"Hush, Flossie, dear, this man is only a servant, you must not forget the dignity attached to your person, even at your early age!"

"I don't care, Flossie will always love you just the same," and the child held out appealing little arms to her humble friend.

"No, Miss Flossie," he said sadly, "you and I must cease to be friends from this day forth."

"I will be your friend always," announced the child in a determined voice, "and Carrots is naughty!"

It was gall and wormwood to Vera to feel that in the contest with this man she was not getting the best of it by any manner of means; he seemed to exercise some sort of extraordinary power of fascination on the child.

"Turnips," she said severely, "I shall get my father to dismiss you at once if ever you take such a liberty again with Miss Flossie."

"Very well, Miss!"

He touched his cap respectfully, and abruptly turned away.

One evening little Flossie seemed unusually fretful and peevish; when the nurse came to take her to bed she clung to Vera and refused to leave her.

"Never mind, nurse," said Vera, "I shall keep Flossie in my room to-night, she will sleep with me."

The child had nestled contentedly with her head on her sister's shoulder, and later on she fell asleep peacefully in Vera's arms.

Suddenly, in the dead of night, Vera awoke with a strange suffocating feeling at her throat. What was this smell, this dense smoke which seemed to fill the room?

She jumped out of bed, hurried on a dressing-gown, and opened her door; she gasped and almost reeled back with the volumes of thick smoke which assailed her. The house was on fire! She heard confused noises, smothered cries, trampling of feet under her window.

Vera's room was the turret-chamber, far away from any of the inhabited parts of the house. It was a fancy of hers to occupy this quaint old room, perched up high in the old turret. She used to say laughingly that she felt herself quite a mediæval princess up there in her castellated bower.

Alas, this strange freak of hers seemed likely now to cost her her life, and, worse than all, Flossie, darling little unconscious, sleeping Flossie, was doomed.

The passage and stairs were already impassable, the flames were even now invading the little antechamber which opened into the bedroom. Vera shut the heavy oak door, but how long would that last as an effectual barrier against the cruel, encroaching enemy.

Catching up the still sleeping child in her arms, she flew to the window. Alas, no hope of escape lay there; to attempt a leap from such a height meant a certain and horrible death.

Far down below she could see figures rushing to and fro, and hear agonised cries and wild appeals; no doubt they had been missed, but who could dare attempt their rescue when all around the foot of the turret the flames were gathering in force and fury.

Vera turned to One whom we all seek when we find human aid failing us. Still clasping her little sister on her bosom, the despairing girl flung herself on her knees by the side of the bed, and sent up an earnest appeal for help to the throne of the Everlasting Father. Even as she prayed, help was nearer to her than she could possibly imagine.

A man had scaled the burning walls; scorning danger for himself, he only thought of the helpless girl and child, and determined to save them, or die in the attempt.

As he reached the window he saw Vera on her knees, and Flossie, who had just awakened, sobbing piteously. The child hardly realised what was wrong, but instinctively she felt something was amiss. The man strode across the room; laying his hand on Vera's shoulder he spoke in authoritative tones:

"Come, Miss Mapleson, there is no time to be lost!"

Vera turned and confronted—the gardener! How bitterly had she scorned him, how deeply had she resented his daring to come between her and her child sister's love, and yet now she turned towards him with such infinite relief and trust.

"Oh, Flossie, my darling little Flossie, save her!" And she held out the child to him.

"Yes, I shall save her first, and then return for you."

"No, no, that would be folly, you would only madly imperil your own life! Go, save Flossie, and leave me to my fate!"

He lost no time in answering, but, taking a blanket from off the bed, and wrapping the child in it, proceeded to make his perilous descent in feverish haste, fearful that he might be too late to save the one he had left!

At the foot of the tower he hurriedly placed the child in the Squire's arms, and, regardless of the imminent peril he now ran, as the walls might crash in at any moment, he once more went up to the turret-chamber. He did not see Vera at first, then he discerned her lying senseless on the floor.

He groaned aloud.

"Too late, after all!"

He seized her in his arms, and, yielding to an irresistible impulse, he strained her to his heart, and pressed his lips to hers; they were cold and bloodless, but, with infinite relief, he knew she was not dead, but only unconscious. When he reached the ground, clasping his precious burden, strong man as he was, he reeled, and would have fallen, if ready hands had not been put forth to save him.

The whole of that wing where the turret chamber had been situated was levelled to the earth by the devouring flames, but the other part of the building suffered little, and with the help of the firemen the burning foe was quenched and conquered at last.

The next morning poor little Flossie lay in bed feverish and flushed; the fright, the doctor asserted, had been most injurious to the sensitive, highly-strung child.

Mrs. Mapleson was quite prostrated, and unable to leave her room, but Vera, very white-faced, and with large black circles round her eyes, was untiring in her care and devotion to her little sister; nothing would induce her to absent herself from the child's bedside.

As Flossie tossed and turned with burning cheeks and glistening eyes, she continually asked for her dear, good, kind Turnips.

No thought of petty jealousies now reigned in Vera's mind; her whole, heartfelt gratitude went out to the man who had so nobly risked his own life to save hers and her sister's.

She knew from Squire Mapleson that the gardener had firmly and proudly refused any sort of monetary reward when the grateful father had gone to thank him for saving his two children. He needed not to be paid, he had said, for accomplishing a common act of humanity.

A maid had been dispatched to seek Turnips. When Vera heard a gentle tap at the door she rose and opened it herself. The gardener stood before her, quiet, self-possessed, and respectful as usual.

"You sent for me, Miss?"

"Yes, my little sister is ill, and she kept repeatedly calling for you, and I"—she coloured and hesitated—"I wanted to thank you for saving my life and Flossie's."

"I only did my duty, Miss," he said coldly. "I am sorry poor little Miss Flossie is ill."

Just then Vera caught sight of his right hand, which was bandaged.

"Oh, you got hurt last night, injured while in the act of saving us!"

"Oh, it is nothing, Miss, a mere scratch, only it will unfit me for my work for the next few days!"

"Oh, that is of little consequence!"

"Excuse me, Miss," and he drew himself up proudly, "but I am a paid menial in your father's service, and must fulfil my engagements to my master."

Laying her hand on his arm she whispered: "Yes, do as she bids you."

"Not when you have imperilled your own life to save his daughters," she said rather impatiently. "Has your hand been seen to, have you had the doctor?"

"No, Miss, it is really nothing. Let me just have a look at Miss Flossie."

He moved to the bed-side. Flossie knew him at once.

"Turnips, my dear Turnips!" and she held out her little arms. "Please kiss me!"

He shook his head, but Vera moved swiftly up to him, and, laying her hand on his arm, whispered—

"Yes, certainly, do as she bids you."

"You once forbade me ever to dare to take such a liberty with your sister."

"It is different now, you have earned the right to kiss her since you saved her life."

"He saved yours too, Carrots!" said Flossie, with startling promptitude. "He may kiss you too!"

Vera flushed hotly, while a guilty look crept over the man's face; to hide his confusion he bent over the tiny cot, and Flossie put her arms round his neck and kissed him. Then the child half rose in her bed, and, taking his hand and Vera's, joined them together in her two little ones. She looked earnestly at them both—

"You will be friends now, Carrots, won't you, with Turnips, 'cause I love you both so, you must love each other too."

The man disengaged his hand quickly and moved to the window as if he wished to avoid his countenance betraying him. After a few moments of awkward silence Vera followed him.

"Turnips," she said gently, then she stopped abruptly, "have you not got any other name but that one?"

He smiled grimly.

"You don't like my name, Miss?"

She blushed and lowered her eyes.

"I should like," she said in a low voice, "to think of the one who saved my life and my sister's by some other name than that one."

"My Christian name is Donald."

"Thank you," she hesitated, then breathed the name very softly. "Donald," she went on, speaking rapidly, "I have heard from my father how you have refused to accept from him any acknowledgment of your noble action; will you at least accept this from me? I had it painted for myself, but I can easily get its exact duplicate done."

She held in her hand an exquisitely painted miniature of Flossie, beautifully mounted in a tiny gold filagree frame set with diamonds and pearls.

He took it and gazed intently at it.

"How like! The very counterpart," he muttered almost unconsciously.

"Everyone says Flossie is so like me," she said softly.

"Thank you, Miss, I accept this—at least the painting, but not the frame," and, taking out his penknife, he deliberately detached the rich setting from the small ivory plaque and returned it to her. It was done in such a masterful way that Vera did not even remonstrate.

"Good-morning, Miss," and without another word he left the room.

* * * * *

A fortnight had passed and Flossie was about and her own bright little self again. And yet Vera carefully avoided asking her little sister to accompany her, as she left the house for the grounds one afternoon. The girl was very pale, her lips were set and resolute. She entered most of the glass houses one after the other; at last, in the palm-house, she espied at the far end a familiar figure, and without a moment's hesitation she went straight up to him.

"My father tells me you are leaving us, Donald; is that so?"

"Yes, Miss."

"Why?"

"Because I have committed a crime, a deadly crime, Miss."

"You committed a crime, Donald! What folly is this? I cannot believe you could ever do anything wrong!"

"And yet, Miss, my crime in your eyes and in those of your set could not be condoned."

"I should never blame you," she murmured very softly.

"Shall I tell you what my crime has been?" he said resolutely.

"Yes," she answered, but she averted her head as if afraid to meet his searching eyes, which seemed to read the very secrets of her soul.

"I have been mad enough to allow myself to care for you, Miss Mapleson. I must leave this place at once because I love you, and I will not face your bitter scorn." He folded his arms and looked at her almost defiantly.

A radiant light of intense happiness diffused itself over her features.

"Donald, I do not scorn you," she whispered softly.

"What, you have no words of scathing contempt for the humble menial who has the arrogance to lift his eyes to yours! You do not seek your father and bid him ignominiously drive forth the insolent, low-born churl who dares to insult you with an avowal of his love?"

Vera drew near to him and, putting her hand in his, she said: "To me you are no menial, Donald, but the noblest and bravest of men—the one man I love."

He put his arm around her, and she let her head rest on his shoulder; his manly voice trembled and betrayed the strong, intense feeling which moved him as he bent over her.

"Will you indeed give up all—home, family, social position—to attach yourself to my humble fortunes and will you stoop to marry me?"

"Yes, Donald," came the answer in a clear, firm voice; "I will gladly give up all so as to be your wife."

"Even to taking the obnoxious name of Turnips?" he smiled, and, bending down, imprinted a passionate kiss on her unresisting lips. "Vera, my darling," he used her Christian name for the first time, "mine at last, and this time I have the right to kiss you."

"You never kissed me before," she protested.

"Yes, Vera, I have a confession to make. The night of the fire, when you lay in my arms, I acted the part of a coward; my brain and heart seemed to be on fire, I was mad for love of you, I despaired of ever winning you, and, Vera, I kissed you then. Ever since I have despised myself for having taken advantage of your helpless state when you were literally at my mercy. Darling, will you forgive me?"

"Nay, Donald, I could not be angry with you if I tried!"

"Well, these reassuring words give me fresh courage for yet another confession I must make. I am not what I seem. I have wooed and won you under a false name. You will have no need to be called Mrs. Turnips!"

She looked up at him in a startled way.

"Oh, what is it? Tell me the truth, quick, Donald! But perhaps Donald is not your real name either?"

"Yes, Donald is my Christian name; I could not bear to mislead you about that. But my full name and title is Albert Edward Donald Lynton, Lord Yvor."

Vera released herself from his incircling arm and started back a few paces from him.

"You! Lord Yvor!"

"Yes; will you deny the love to Lord Yvor which you so readily granted to the humble gardener?"

Poor Vera gazed at him bewildered.

"I cannot understand—tell me, what does it all mean?"

"Come," and, taking her hand, he led her to a rustic seat; "let us sit down and I will tell you all. Ten years ago I was a very young man, full of life and hopes; everything smiled on me; I was endowed with an immense fortune, titled, and the master of Pen-Yvor Castle, which, as you know, is close by your father's house, and one of the show places of England.

"I fell in love with a girl—don't be jealous, Vera, darling, I did not love her as I love you now; it was a sort of boyish infatuation. However, I discovered that this girl did not love me really; she feigned an affection for me which she did not feel, and she had simply accepted my hand because I was Lord Yvor, and was so wealthy. In fact I discovered she loved another man whom she had jilted to accept my suit.

"I charged her with her baseness, and was so revolted with the whole of womankind that I swore I would never wed. I shut up Pen-Yvor Castle, went abroad, travelled about seeking solace in hunting, shooting and yachting.

"Finally I settled down in a remote part of Brittany, where I addicted myself to gardening and all sorts of horticulture. This is where I gained the knowledge which rendered me fit to fulfil my functions of head gardener on your father's estate.

"Last winter I happened to go down to the Riviera, and at the very hotel where I was stopping at Cannes you chanced to be staying with your mother. I believe you had come there to spend a few weeks on account of Mrs. Mapleson's health.

"I rarely used my title abroad, and was inscribed on the hotel books as Mr. Lynton. At any rate, neither you nor your mother noticed me, but I saw you on several occasions, and I could never again banish your image from my mind. I returned to Brittany and sought to forget you, but in vain.

"Of course, the plain course open to me would have been to resume my rank and title, return to Pen-Yvor Castle and woo and win you as Lord Yvor. But I recoiled from such means. I dreaded being accepted by you simply because I was Lord Yvor. That bitter experience of my youth haunted me still. So I thought out this plan.

"I answered your father's advertisement for a gardener, presented myself with excellent testimonials written by myself as Lord Yvor, and was accepted. When I came here first, to my intense disappointment you were away on a visit, and only returned three weeks later.

"Meanwhile I had quite lost my heart on little Flossie; the child was so like you, the colour of her hair, everything about her, reminded me of you, and I loved her first for your sake, but very soon she won me herself by her winning, loving little ways. Your brother Teddy also took the strongest possible fancy to me, and those two children brightened my whole life.

"Then you came, and your proud, haughty air chilled me; from the very first you seemed to take a strong dislike to me; and the day you surprised me kissing Flossie, you spurned me as if I were mud! Oh, how I writhed under your cruel, taunting words!"

"Donald, forgive me, I think I had begun to love you even then, but in my fierce pride I hated and despised myself for thinking of such a one as I thought you then were. Afterwards, when you saved my life and Flossie's, love conquered pride, and I knew then that I loved you above everyone on earth, and I felt that I could gladly give up everything to be your wife."

"My beautiful Vera, for your sake I wish I were a king, so as to crown that wealth of tawny gold!" And once more Lord Yvor bent to impress kisses on her lips, brow and hair.

Suddenly upon the absorbed and enraptured lovers there broke a shrill, childish voice :

"Oh, Turnips, Carrots, I have been looking for you everywhere," and little Flossie stood before them. They both looked utterly confused, and Vera's cheeks assumed the brightest of crimson hues. The child gazed at them in a puzzled way.

"Why do you pretend you won't kiss before me, and then do it on the sly? Turnips, Carrots," she continued severely, "that's surely wrong. Father says we must always do everything openly," and the clear, innocent blue eyes fixed themselves reproachfully on the guilty couple.

"You are right Flossie darling, but your sister and I do not mean to act in an underhand way, we are going straight to Squire Mapleson to tell him we are engaged."

Flossie shook her head sadly.

"Oh, you naughty, bad Turnips! So you are going to marry Carrots? What about me, then, when I grow up?"

The look of despair on the child's face amused and touched the young earl. He caught up Flossie in his arms.

"Little one, won't you have me as a brother instead?"

This new suggestion delighted her, she laughed merrily and clapped her hands.

"Yes, like Teddy, only a much bigger brother—that will be nice; and you will always tell me pretty fairy tales?"

"Yes, certainly."

"Still, Carrots did say I was not to forget the dignity attached to my person when you kissed me. And now she lets you kiss her, so I s'pose she's forgotten her dignity!"

"Oh, you terrible child," chimed in Vera, and she in her turn hugged little Flossie.

"That child's logic is certainly disconcerting," laughed Lord Yvor.

"And when you're married, Carrots, you will never quarrel with Turnips again, will you?" the child asked eagerly.

"Well, that depends on his conduct to me," and Vera looked archly at the young man.

It was a seven days' wonder in Society when Lord Yvor's romantic engagement to Vera Mapleson became known. As for Teddy, he was wild with delight; he confided to his future brother-in-law that he was the dearest old chap in the world, and that he had known from the very first that he was a true gentleman. The beautiful Lady Yvor and her husband are still known among their very intimate friends by the quaint names of Carrots and Turnips.

The Gentle Art of Cooking.

How it Caused an Upset at Laburnum Villa.

It was well on towards the end of September. Mr .and Mrs. Sinclair, with Toddles, who was now almost four years old, were sojourning at Llandudno.

Time was drawing near when the trio must say farewell to all the delights of North Wales; and it had been decided that Gerald should return on the Wednesday and manage to exist until his wife followed on the Saturday. He was not quite sure whether he could live without her for three days, or whether he could do without the vicious tugs at his moustache that Toddles was in the habit of giving, but he would try.

It was, therefore, in a sad mood and a London and North-Western train that he arrived in London once more. His sad mood grew sadder as he reached Laburnum Villa and thought of the three days he must spend alone there.

He occupied two hours after he reached home in writing to his wife telling her how miserable he felt, how lonely he would be, and what a long way off Saturday seemed. Then he went out and ate a huge dinner, after which he visited the Pavilion.

He became depressed again when he reached home early Thursday morning and was the sole occupant of Laburnum Villa, for the servants were away too.

On the following morning he dressed and went to town for breakfast, and that same night he filled up by going to the Tivoli. In the meantime writing to Mrs. Sinclair and saying that the days were like eternity.

When he arose on Friday morning he said to himself: "You know, Gerald my boy, it's silly to go out and get meals when there's bound to be stuff downstairs to eat. Why not get your own breakfast?"

So elated with this idea was he, that he rushed downstairs as he was, and hunted about. Naturally there wasn't much about, as the house had been empty for three weeks. But in the larder he came across a piece of bacon, and then the thought struck him that there was no milk or bread.

He rushed to the front door and opened it, the road was empty.

Suddenly a small boy turned the corner, and Gerald waved frantically and called to him. The small boy looked his jaw dropped, his eyes went wide open, and his cap visibly rose on his head. Then he turned and bolted as though running for his life.

"H'm! Curious," observed Gerald aloud, as he thoughtfully rubbed his face. Then to his astonishment his hand came away covered with lather, and he remembered that in the enthusiasm of the moment he had thrown down his razor as he was shaving and had come downstairs simply attired in shirt and trousers. No wonder the small boy ran home and got whipped for saying he had seen a madman with froth all over his face.

But Gerald was still enthusiastic, and, after dressing, he commissioned another small boy to fetch him milk, eggs, and butter, from a local dairyman who was in the habit of supplying Laburnum Villa.

Then he got to work. He sliced the bacon first and then his finger. This necessitated a stoppage for bandaging the cut, and talking about it in a humid strain. Then he got a frying-pan and put it over the gas, whilst he went to fetch some water for the kettle.

A tin-tack penetrated his carpet slipper, whilst in the scullery, which necessitated a further stoppage. At last he returned to the kitchen, but was assailed by a nauseous odour and a cloud of smoke. At first he thought the house was on fire, but all he found was a hole in the frying-pan. This was certainly awkward, he would have to find another frying-pan.

Then the thought struck him that he had seen people put grease into frying-pans, and, accordingly, when he had found a second of these utensils, he put in a liberal dab of butter and then the bacon.

Now came the eggs. He had certainly observed people break them, and thought he could do it. He picked up one gingerly, and knocked it on the side of the frying-pan. Unfortunately he hit it so hard that, before he had time to lift it and drop the contents into the pan, the whole lot had dropped over the gas stove.

It was aggravating, to say the least of it, but he was more careful with the rest, and presently had a right royal breakfast of eggs, bacon, bread, butter, marmalade, and tea before him.

There was one other little upset, though. That was when he went to pour the tea out, only water came, as he had forgotten to put the tea-leaves in. But still he got on first-rate considering everything, was his own impression.

At the office that day a great thought struck him. He would take home three other men who were always prepared for, what he would have termed in his younger days, a lark; they could cook some dinner and have bridge or music afterwards.

He was so fired by this idea that he left the office immediately, and went round hunting up the other fellows. By a piece of good fortune he found they were all disengaged, and were quite willing to come.

For the purposes of this story I will call these three friends of Gerald by the well-known names of Brown, Jones, and Smith. They were three bachelors, and were well-known on the Stock Exchange as the ringleaders of almost every joke that was played.

Gerald met them at five o'clock and they went together to Leadenhall Market, where they purchased: A shoulder of lamb, a tin of ox-tail soup, potatoes, cauliflower, artichokes, fruit.

Gerald wanted to buy bacon and eggs as well, because he fancied he was great guns at cooking them, but he was persuaded not to. Whilst Smith offered to make an apple-pie if they'd get the various ingredients, only as nobody knew what they were, they decided simply to have fruit.

All the purchases were packed with the purchasers in a couple of hansons, and they drove off to Laburnum Villa. Brown and Jones would sing, and as they were not both in one cab, the two hansoms had to keep together, so, as Brown put it, the glorious harmony could be heard.

At length Laburnum Villa was reached, and very soon the culinary operations were put in hand.

Smith volunteered to open the tin of ox-tail soup, and after chopping a lump out of the table and cutting his coat-sleeve, he succeeded in breaking the table knife which he was using. Someone then suggested trying a tin-opener which was used most successfully.

Then Jones, in a sonorous voice, read out the directions, which Gerald, Brown, and Smith all attempted to carry out together. The result was that Smith upset the hot water over Brown's foot, which resulted further in a desultory argument. Jones laughed so much that he upset the tin of ox-tail, whereupon half of the contents spread out in a large brown stain over the hitherto white table.

At last, though, they got the ingredients together, and presently Gerald poured a hot, sticky, very dark liquid into a tureen. Somebody suggested it might grow cold whilst the joint was being cooked; so they turned the gas on and put the tureen in the oven to keep warm.

Then came the great cooking feat of the evening, the joint and the vegetables. Now each of them was firmly convinced he could cook the joint like a chef, so it was arranged they should toss for it. They did it on the principle of "odd man"—that is, they all tossed, Gerald's coin came down "heads" and the other three "tails," therefore Gerald being odd man, had first choice.

He chose the joint.

Smith won the next, and chose the potatoes. Brown got the cauliflower, and Jones the artichokes.

Then Gerald disappeared and presently returned with Mrs. Beeton under his arm (figuratively speaking, of course). His advent was greeted with a chorus of cheers. After much perusal of this lady's interesting work, a remarkable scene ensued.

Gerald was doing what he called basting. He'd got very mixed up, but was quite happy in laying butter and flour an inch thick on that unhappy shoulder of lamb. He also made a hole in it and filled it with butter and flour.

"That makes the gravy, you know, you chaps," he said.

The others listened in awe-stricken silence, and watched with fascinated eyes. But presently they returned to their work.

Smith was cutting bits off the potatoes and off his fingers, whilst he swore softly to himself.

Brown insisted in cutting all the green off the cauliflower, because he said you never eat it.

Jones wasn't quite sure what you did with artichokes, but still he thought they should be pealed, so he cut them about until there wasn't much of the original vegetable left.

Brown and Jones were still musically inclined, and insisted on singing duets. Oh! Mrs. Sinclair, if you could only see your kitchen now.

Presently Gerald grew tired of basting and put the shoulder of lamb into the oven just below the tureen full of ox-tail soup. He then turned the gas on full, and refilled his pipe.

"Bang!"

A loud report rang through the kitchen. Brown and Jones stopped singing. Smith ceased to swear, and Gerald dropped his pipe.

Then a hissing, bubbling noise was heard from the oven, whilst clouds of steam poured out. Between them they opened the oven door, and then, ye gods! what a picture.

The tremendous heat of the oven had been too much for the tureen, and, in consequence, it had cracked. All the soup had flown down over the shoulder of lamb and then on to the gas, putting it out.

Then Brown and Jones fell into each other's arms and laughed until they sobbed. Whilst Smith and Gerald held a heated argument on the subject.

They eventually decided that it would improve the shoulder of lamb to be bathed in ox-tail soup, and once more went on with the culinary operations. Smith got the potatoes in his saucepan and then dropped it on the floor, where it unfortunately fell on his toe. Brown and Jones resumed their hilarity, whilst Smith resumed his speech. They picked the potatoes up and got them in a saucepan again.

Then Brown and Jones had their cauliflower and artichokes ready, and placed them in saucepans. Unfortunately Jones dropped the artichokes into the wrong saucepan, so they cooked with the potatoes.

Gerald proposed a rubber of whist whilst they waited for the dinner to cook, and this proved so interesting that they forgot all about the cooking.

Presenting a horrible smell of burning meat pervaded the kitchen. Gerald jumped up, and, rushing for the oven, pulled the door open. There was the shoulder of lamb burnt to a most mournful shade of black.

But despite this and the fact that the cauliflower had gone to pieces, and that the potatoes and artichokes were only half-cooked, they still sat down to dinner. And, what is more, they ate it. They admitted afterwards that the fruit was really very nice.

"Well, what shall it be, you chaps?" said Gerald, when they had finished eating. "Bridge or music?"

They decided to have music.

"Come along then into the drawing-room," cried Gerald. "And we'll outdo Orpheus and make the welkin ring."

They all commenced to smoke pipes in the drawing-room. Shades of Mrs. Sinclair! Gerald officiated at the piano.

Glee after glee was howled. From "Who will o'er the downs so free?" to "Come, Landlord, fill the blowing bowl."

Suddenly there was a ring at the bell.

"Cease those mellow tones, Smith," cried Gerald. "Go! Unloose the portals wide, and see who stands before our gates."

Smith departed to the door, where we will accompany him. Another impatient ring quickened his footsteps, and then he opened to the caller.

"Great Scott!" he muttered, and then he was dumb. For there was a lady with a little child; from her appearance Smith knew it was Mrs. Sinclair, although he had never met her. She shot one indignant glance at him, and then swept in, leaving him gasping at the door. With a sudden inspiration he seized his hat and coat and rushed out into the wild, dark night.

And this was the reception Mrs. Sinclair received.

"Who was the weary wayfarer, Smith?" bellowed her husband. "But come along and take the tenor in 'Here's to the maiden of bashful fifteen.'"

Through the cloud of smoke a figure advanced, and it said: "I am the weary wayfarer."

Gerald turned and saw. His lower jaw dropped, and a despairing groan emanated from his lips. Brown and Jones hurriedly made for the door, and when once safe in the street, they leant up against one another and howled with laughter until a policeman moved them on.

But what of Gerald?

Laden with the consciousness of guilt he sat wretchedly in the tobacco-laden air of the Laburnum Villa drawing-room. Mrs. Sinclair stood before him. She, too, was speechless, but from a different reason. Then she found her tongue and for a quarter of an hour she talked without cessation.

This was the way he pined for her. This was the way that he passed the eternity of time that he spoke of. Then she ran off at a tangent, and spoke of turning her drawing-room into a tap-room with six or seven pot-house loafers.

"It's always the way. Oh, you deceitful man. I can't let you out of my sight for a minute."

"But, dear——"

"Don't call me dear, Mr. Sinclair."

"Well, then. You said you weren't coming back until to-morrow. And we could have got the room tidy by then, and the dinner things washed up."

"Dinner things," shrieked Mrs. Sinclair. "Do you mean to say that you and those brutes have been eating?"

Here Toddles began to weep profoundly.

"See how you're treating your son, sir. Oh! My child! What a father you have to be sure."

"Confound it all, Ethel——"

"That's right, swear at me. Abuse me, go on, I can bear it."

"What's the good of trying to talk sense to a woman," muttered Gerald disgustedly.

In the meantime Mrs. Sinclair had gone into the dining-room, and Gerald heard her shriek of dismay with an inward tremor.

Then he heard her visit the kitchen, and another shriek quite upset his nerves. So that when Mrs. Sinclair burst into the room talking excitedly, he made not the slightest attempt to argue.

"Spoilt a dinner service! All the saucepans ruined! The kitchen table spoilt! Messes all over the linoleum, and the gas stove like a pig-sty! Oh, you—you—you b-b-brute!" Then she commenced to cry. "This was what (sob) I came home a day earlier for (sob). This was the loving (sob)—welcome I expected. Ten great drunken beasts (sobs) trapsing about the house (sob)—(more sobs)."

Gerald thought tremendously.

"How dare you do it in my house? Twenty great hulking brutes spoiling everything?"

Gerald ventured to suggest that he owned a portion of the house at any rate, and that she might be exaggerating about the number of visitors.

"Go away and don't talk to me," she cried, as he approached her.

And then he went into the kitchen. Cleared up the mess. Washed up the dinner things and put them away. Then he commenced on the pans and pots to try to get them clean. So intent was he on his task that he did not hear a light footstep cross the kitchen, or know that there was anyone else in the room beside him, until a soft voice whispered in his ear:

"That isn't the way to do it, Gerald, let me help?"

Regardless of the condition of his hands he turned and took his wife in his arms, and—well, that's how the quarrel ended.

Splendid Series.

The Return of the Prodigal.

Being the fifth of six stories told in the Brighton Express and now related

BY

WINIFRED GRAHAM.

"Who is that?" he asked, gazing steadfastly on the face of the girl in the picture.

Again the six friends met on their return from business. During the cold weather the story telling became quite an institution.

That night Mr. Pitman, who was an amateur artist, and indulged an impressionist craze in leisure hours, offered to paint them a word picture from human life. He was screwing up his eyes as if the window were a vanishing point or a perspective, and trying to discern the passing scene without through grey evening mists.

"I wish I could get that effect on canvas," he said. "The dim houses wrapped in gloom, the half light. I might call it 'Seen from a railway train'—just one of those fashionable blurs that create talk and sensation."

"I know the sort of thing," said Stourbridge. "You see a dark object in a fog, and wonder if it is a church tower or a hansom cab; then you see it's a signal-box—awfully clever, but mightily uninteresting!"

"I say, I heard an awfully queer tale to-day," began Carter, stroking his imperial.

"Yes, but don't do me out of my word picture!" sighed Pitman.

"We'll toss up," said Harford, drawing a coin from his overcoat pocket. "Heads Pitman, tails, Carter."

He threw it in the air.

"Heads it is; fire away, Pitman, we are all impatience."

Pitman surveyed his audience with a benign smile.

"She was an artist, of course," he commenced, "that is why I am interested in her history—an heiress, young and beautiful, who adored painting, and only lived for art. Her name? Oh, yes!—Moore Meredith. Her age? Well, a woman's age is sacred after seventeen. She had been an orphan since her infancy, and lived with an old uncle, who eventually condescended to die in the peaceful, orderly manner suitable to his well-regulated household, and courteous considerate nature.

"He just took up his evening paper, leant back in a red leather chair, and breathed his soul into space, without even troubling to ring the bell. To enhance this estimable gentleman's merits, I may add, he left his heroine his fortune.

"She had, you will see, no need to paint for money, but the love of fame had been implanted in her breast since childhood. She was ambitious, and her one aim in existence was to win renown. She longed to create a picture that would take the world by storm, which, after all, was a fortunate craving, since it compensated for the loss of those dead faces that should have brightened her life.

"Art was her father, her mother, her all. Genius the companion of her solitude, and the all-engrossing study gave her something to live for.

"She might have spent her time in the gay and frivolous set that eagerly desired to enlist this brilliant young heiress into their ranks; but she preferred the attractions of her quiet studio—worked like the veriest slave—with no one to gainsay her.

"'Every man to his taste'; so the world passed by, and smiled.

"One morning Moore Meredith sat idly in her studio—it was the first day for weeks she had been inactive—while the early sun crept through her windows, shedding its bright light round the model throne and on all the artistic adornments of the room.

"In the centre stood a large easel, bearing a half-finished painting, at which she was gazing somewhat wistfully.

"'That picture,' she said, rising and standing before it with folded arms, 'might make my name if only I could get the man's face.'

"She knew exactly what she wanted, but the face was hard to find. Already the form of a beautiful girl, in a clinging robe of palest grey, floating like feathery evening mists about her figure, stood out on the canvas.

Digitized by Google

"Her eyes wore a fascinated, half-fearful look, suggestive of a creature in pain; her expression was one of horrified surprise; yet the lips were parted in a helpless, tragic smile, so flickering, so undecided, that it seemed to fade and wake again before your sight. Surely this was genius in its true sense! And that fair, yet puzzled face was listening. You could conjure up the storm of thought in the distracted mind, and tell that she was wavering up on the brink of evil.

"The second character had yet to be painted, brought to life by Moore's magic touch. She pictured him in her mind with rugged features and haggard eyes, a man with a striking personality, years older than the girl. It is not the fresh buoyancy of youth that always has the power to charm. More frequently, to the pure, unsophisticated woman, who has just stepped, with reluctant feet, from 'where the brook and river meet,' the determined man of the world—the man with a past—can infatuate her trusting soul.

"'He should stand,' thought Moore, 'against a dark background, in the act of drawing the trembling maiden boldly to him, while the summer evening closed around them, as if to hide her weakness and blind his hungering eyes.'

"There were daring touches in the half-completed work, significant of the artist's spirit and vivid imagination; it was the work of a skilful and well-trained hand, that immediately demanded more than ordinary attention. Moore was satisfied with what she had done, it pleased her artistic eye, but she was troubled how to proceed.

"'I must get a model,' she cried, pacing the room; 'if I fail I will burn the picture! The girl does well; she is life-like, she is possible; but the crowning point is the man!'

"She was expecting some models on approval, and, as if in answer to her thoughts, a voice said outside the locked door:

"'A gentleman to see you, miss.'

"She hurried eagerly upstairs, all impatient to scrutinise the newcomer. So many interviews had proved fruitless. Wrinkled old seamen, Olympian gods, ferocious brigands, blue-eyed boys, Hercules, and Saint Sebastians had come in turn seeking employment, but she had sent them all away with a hopeful 'Some other time, perhaps.'

"As Moore entered the room she noticed at a glance that her wildest expectations were realised. Here was the face of her dreams, the man who had whispered of worse than death in the ear of her grey-gowned heroine! Marks of care lined his brow, his features were tanned and weather-beaten by a long sojourn in foreign lands. As she advanced towards him a bewildering variety of expressions flitted across his countenance, while his eyes mutely owned the searching interest and admiration she aroused in him.

"His was no ordinary, commonplace personality. Those eyes, in action or repose equally irresistible, had a power to charm at one moment and terrify the next. They were exactly what she longed to depict. His dark hair was streaked with grey; he had passed the prime of youth.

"As she felt the magnetic influence of his glance Moore Meredith could have shrieked for joy.

"With an effort to control her excitement she addressed him:

"'You have come to sit for me? I am so glad, because you are just the model I am in need of; I might have searched the world over before I found a better. I am madly anxious to finish my picture, and was perfectly in despair. It is heartrending to be stopped in your work. I shall want you to-day—don't say you're engaged? I don't mind what I pay, but I must begin this very morning—now, at once!'

"He bowed assent, but there was a queer light in his eyes, a sad drooping of the lips.

"Moore gave a sigh of relief.

"'Come, and I will show you my studio. Every minute I am away seems waste of time.'

"Fired by her enthusiasm, the stranger followed.

"As Moore turned back to speak she noticed how well he walked, and how upright he was. She had an uncomfortable feeling that the new model was a gentleman.

"'I suppose Mr. Robinson of the Art School sent you?' continued Moore.

"Again he inclined his head. As yet he had only listened to her respectfully, without uttering a word.

"She found herself waiting curiously to hear his voice.

"'This is my picture,' she said, 'what do you think of it?'

"He stared at the face on the canvas long and earnestly; it seemed to transfix him. She fancied he paled and breathed harder. Had she so well depicted what was in her mind, that even the sight of this one figure in the unfinished scene could move a strong man almost to tears?

"'It is wonderful,' he said at last, turning his eyes full upon Moore, and his voice vibrated oddly; it was just the sad, low tone she had expected, and that of an educated man.

"Then he walked to the spot she indicated, and as she turned to her easel and took up her palette her cup of happiness was full. All that morning she kept him there, working feverishly. He seemed to catch from her a keen sense of delight, an all-absorbing interest.

"'You will come to-morrow—and every to-morrow till the picture is complete?' she said, smiling. 'I feel exhilarated by to-day's progress, for I am the hardest master to please over my work. Sometimes I destroy it in a frenzy; occasionally I have been mean enough to send some thankless tasks to decorate the walls of children's hospitals. They should have the best; but such is life. Ah, you smile. Perhaps you have done the same?'

"'Who has not? The greatest works go naturally to the highest places; the lowliest do for the sick poor. It was ever so.'

"There was a ring of sarcasm in his reply that chilled Moore.

"The man perplexed her.

"Day after day he returned to his post, watching her every movement during those silent hours in a way that occasionally made the girl self-conscious.

"The picture was nearly finished and the artist quite worn out with fatigue, but unwilling to own it till the very last touch of the brush should kiss farewell to the radiant canvas.

"'I want to give you a more speaking impression,' she said. 'You don't live at this moment. Everyone must see you are talking—animated. I could put greater life into your face. I know——'

"'I think,' replied the man, 'that I am in fault. I grow heavy while sitting in silence.'

"Moore's face brightened.

"'Then talk,' she said; 'there's a good idea; tell me a story if you will.'

"'Shall I?'

"'Yes, yes.'

"'But perhaps you would rather not listen?'

"'What is it to be about?'

"'Your picture brought the idea to my mind.'

"Moore worked steadily on.

"'Then I am sure to be interested.'

"'It is a very simple little narrative—a tale of the world we live in—a place so saturated with sin, that sooner or later all must feel its presence, and be brought into contact with evil. How can the devil be concealed for long, when the earth reeks of him—ringing from day to day with the news of murderous deeds, while temptations haunt and dog the footsteps of every human being?'

"Moore's head was bent, but he saw that his words awoke her curiosity. For he spoke ferociously, while his eyes flashed.

"'Once there lived a girl like you—young, talented, fair—her face was sweet as an angel's—her soul pure as a child's. She lived in a paradise of blissful ignorance, the world was a pleasure garden—an Eden before the fall. She was the joy of her home—a ray of sunlight—a star! The poor loved her too; she would visit them in their cottages, and comfort them in their troubles. She had sympathy for all—the kind, encouraging word—the soft, angelic smile. Such a woman was born to hold sway over lower minds—to be holy, happy, blessed! What should you think ruined that young life so full of promise, so tender and beautiful?'

"Moore looked up with a cynical little smile.

"'The usual thing,' she said, 'love.'

"The man started.

"'You think that, too,' he replied, as if she had re-echoed his thoughts.

"'It is the theory of the age,' she answered lightly. 'Love is out of date—played threadbare—stale.'

"'It is terrible to hear that from the young,' he said; 'but my story is quite old-fashioned—it happened years ago—when women believed in men,'

"'In the days of grandmother?'

"No, nearer than that—in the days of your mother, shall we say?'

"'Go on. Love shattered her paradise?'

"'Yes. Suddenly a spirit of darkness in the form of man cast his shadow across her path. He met her first in the green country—it was Springtime, and all the flowers were starting up through the earth, the trees were budding, and their souls were young. They would wander for hours through meadows whose sweet scent sometimes in after years came back with gall and bitterness.

"'She saw in the man all that her heart desired. He was full of strength and hope, he was handsome and daring, he took her by storm. Heaven knows he meant no harm; if Fate had willed things otherwise he would have cherished her till death. But matters turn out so differently and unexpectedly to what is wished. There are dark days as well as bright—a place of torture as well as an abode of bliss.

"'The marriage bells chimed out over hill and dale—one glorious summer morning these two were made one by the village parson. All the old folk, and the children, the young men and maidens, came out to wish them God-speed. They decorated their working carts with green boughs and wild flowers, and hung mottoes across the road. Oh! the hollow mockery of the words "Long life and happiness!" and "God bless the bride and bridegroom."

"'Even the little railway station rang with cheers as they steamed away, for she was loved, and he was respected. Men are not all bad from their youth up that afterwards sink to the lowest degradation. They may be honest, noble lads who have never told a lie. They go out into the wilderness full of bright ideals, with a sure faith in all mankind, till the dust of cities clogs their spirit, the mire from their boots reaches to the heart—bad times come.

"'The wife is tired, she wants her carriage; the babe is ill, and it cries till the heart is sore over the woes of the wretched world into which it has been brought to dwell. The wicked across the way flourish before the husband's bloodshot eyes even as a green bay tree. They fatten on their dainties.

"'There is the rich money-lender who has paupered thousands, the betting-man who has prospered on the turf, the gaily-dressed woman who has lost her fair name, and they all smile and dine and laugh. It teaches him how good it is for bodily ease and comfort to stray from the path of virtue. Forgive me, Miss Meredith, if I tire you, but this is not a sermon but a history. Remember I am telling a tale from life—every word is true.'

"'Is that so?' asked Moore, raising her finely-pencilled eyebrows and pausing a moment in her work.

"'Oh, yes. I do not care for fiction.'

"'Tell me more.'

"'It was gradual, the downward road to ruin and disgrace—a moral slope is far more dangerous than an actual precipice. It is so alluring. He fell into the hands of a false friend, one who fêted and flattered him, but by degrees drew him into cruel meshes beyond escape.

"'He made a tool of this young fellow, who was as wax in his hand. He held out the dazzling prospect of wealth and power to be obtained by the simple art of copying a signature. Oh, it is not difficult, only to turn the name upside down, and draw the words backwards.

"'He taught him to perfection, this clever man, and then persuaded the novice to do his dirty work, with the

The New Permanent Cure for Corpulency

Restores Beauty of Figure with Renewed Health, Strength, and Energy.

SOME PLAIN FACTS.

The Problem Solved. Stout persons who have for years been vainly seeking some means of permanently reducing weight, and who have undergone all sorts of privations in the way of restricted and disagreeable dietary, as well as exhausting physical exercises, hot baths, drugging and purging, will welcome "Antipon" as something providential; for this wonderful specific solves the problem of the radical cure of obesity once and for all."

What "Antipon" is like. "Antipon" is the result of a new discovery, or, rather, of a combination of discoveries. It is an entirely harmless liquid, pleasant to the palate, containing no mercury or any other mineral substance, in appearance like a light red wine, and is taken in small doses at stated times. It has no purgative effect, nor does it cause the slightest discomfort or nausea. On the contrary, it is refreshing and thirst-quenching, and an excellent tonic drink mixed with a mineral water. "Antipon" can be had of chemists, price 2s. 6d. and 4s. 6d. per bottle, from stock or on order, or, should any difficulty arise, may be obtained (on sending cash remittance) post free, under private package, direct from the sole manufacturers, the Antipon Company, 13 Buckingham Street, Strand, London, W.C.

Its Effects on Fat Deposits. Excessive and persistent obesity is a disease, and a dangerous one. Masses of fat form round the vital organs and interfere seriously with their naturally healthy action. "Antipon" gradually but surely destroys these unwholesome fatty deposits, dissolves them and banishes them from the system. It eliminates the root-evil, and the fat does not form again. These accumulations of fatty matter are sometimes enormous, and when "Antipon" throws them out of the system the beneficent effect upon the general health is positively magical.

General Reductive Results. "Antipon" is generally effective in the destruction and elimination of the subcutaneous fat that renders the personal appearance so uncomely. Not only does the waist measurement become normal, but the unnecessary fat over the entire body surface disappears: the double chin, the flabby cheeks, the bulky neck, the "podgy" limbs—all become healthily normal again, the whole body symmetrical and elegant.

Rate of Decrease. "Antipon," the most potent of fat absorbents, is so prompt in asserting its reductive power that there is a calculable difference in weight within a day and a night of taking the first dose—from 8 oz. to 3 lbs. in ordinary cases, as much as 4 lbs. in exceptional developments of the disease. There is thereafter a steady diurnal decrease until the attainment of proper weight and graceful proportions, when the doses should cease.

No Change of Diet Necessary. "Antipon" is a treatment in itself, and dispenses with drastic rules as to food and drink. Common prudence is the only auxiliary required, as every common-sense person will realise. The semi-starvation dietary prescribed by many methods is altogether opposed to the treatment of "Antipon," whose tonic effects are such that appetite is rendered keener, and a greater amount of food is required.

Tonic Effects of "Antipon." Not only is a healthy appetite promoted, but the whole digestive apparatus is toned up and strengthened; assimilation and nutrition are wonderfully assisted with marvellous effect upon muscle, nerve and brain. "Antipon" prevents a sluggish circulation by keeping the blood in a normal and healthy condition, so that the waste in the system is properly eliminated instead of being deposited by the blood on the tissues.

Physicians' Approval. The ingredients of "Antipon" having been separately investigated by several doctors, have received their warmest approval, and the opportunities they have had of testing its practical results have confirmed their opinion to the full.

Conclusion. Such, then, is "Antipon," the greatest of known specifics for the permanent cure of corpulence. A course of "Antipon" is like a draught of some elixir of life, for not only is the subject unburdened of superfluous fat, but he (or she) feels a new being, increased in strength and vitality, full of energy, and capable of enjoying the good things of life once more.

WHAT THE PRESS SAYS ABOUT "ANTIPON."

"'Antipon' not only speedily absorbs and throws out of the system all superabundant adipose matter, but increases strength and vitality."—Illustrated London News.

"'Antipon" will prove a lasting blessing to thousands."—Lady's Realm.

"Readers troubled with embonpoint will find in 'Antipon' a reliable and permanent cure, exceedingly pleasant to take, and being a powerful fat absorbent, it dissolves and eliminates from the body all superfluous adipose, both the internal fat and the subcutaneous. It also forms a strength-giving tonic, improves the appetite, assists digestion, and tones up the whole system, without the sufferer incurring any distressing restrictions as to diet, exercise, &c."—Weldon's Lady's Journal, May, 1903.

"'Antipon' may be counted upon to take off within the first day and night an amount of superfluous fat ranging from 8 ozs. to 3 lbs., and the reductive action continues until the desired symmetry of form and figure is reached."—Methodist Recorder.

"'Antipon' increases muscular strength and helps to revitalise the nervous system."—Penny Illustrated Paper.

"'Antipon' is now among the great remedies of the age. It is pleasant to the taste, purely vegetable, and absolutely harmless.'—Eastern Morning News.

promise of much profit, assurances of safety, and no chance of detection. It was a very complicated affair; but the temptation was too strong; the bridegroom of a year and a half back fell to the level of a common defrauder.

"'Such acts seldom remain untraced; there are always bloodhounds to run the transgressor to earth; their way is indeed hard. His evil-doing was about to be brought to light, when he confessed the truth to his stricken wife, and left her to fly the country—a criminal escaping justice. Perhaps his last words to her were the hardest to bear of all: "It was for your sake, Nan; I did it for you."

"'He called her "Nan," though it was not her name. He held her in his arms for the last time; he pressed those pure lips, and whispered good-bye in the little shell-like ear, which had learnt his guilty secret in sorrow and dread.

"'Then he left her numb and petrified, to pass to an unknown land, out of her life for ever. Through a well worked-out plan, even in her feeble state of health, this loving, heart-broken woman, widowed through his crime, misled the search being made for her husband.

"'By a letter left in his handwriting—some missing garments near a rushing torrent—it was generally supposed he had destroyed himself, and his flight was never known. Shortly after this his little daughter, whom he was destined never to see or know, was born to Nan—all that she had left of that wrecked life, all that remained of her ill-fated marriage.

"'Alone and deserted, she pined and died a lingering death in the old country home.

"'The man—her husband—in distant climes, yearned for news of his dear one, whom he had so terribly wronged. Through the agency of a friend, in whom he could trust, he learnt that his punishment was fully complete—the wife he loved—was dead! crushed by the weight of suffering and shame.

"'His child had been adopted out of pity by a rich relation—he would never see her. His last hope that some day both mother and child might rejoin him, when he could make a fresh home and new start was dashed to the ground. Nothing remained but the unending torture of regret, the scathing fires of remorse! Separated from his own flesh and blood, banished from his native land, the exile lived on.'

"He paused in his narrative.

"'What became of him?' asked Moore. 'Did he go from bad to worse, or lead a life of honest toil?'

"'He lived on,' repeated the man, 'how, I am not at liberty to say. He may have done some good, some harm—all careers are mixed. He neither murdered nor stole; but he made enemies and pals, he had rises and falls, bad luck, misadventures, sickness, and sorrows.'

"'How like a true tale—nothing happens in the end after his first false step except the commonplace, ordinary routine of existence. If you had invented the story that man would have become rich and powerful, or rushed on madly down the hill to destruction, we should have seen him in every imaginable predicament. I have sometimes fancied that if it were not for my art I should have turned my attention to novel-writing. I must always be doing something, inactivity is impossible to my temperament.'

"'Suppose then,' said the man, 'that what I have told you was the foundation of a plot for a book, and I were to ask you to finish it for me—your brain is more fertile than mine. Should the father and daughter meet again in years to come, when he is old and strangely altered, while she, the very image of her dead mother, is young, proud, beautiful, what would she say to him—how view his sorry case?

"'Put yourself, Miss Meredith, in that girl's place. She has learnt, we will imagine, the history of her father's sin, and the cause of her mother's death, for the first time. He has come back to her after a life of penitence and misery to pray her to pity and forget.'

"'In a book,' replied Moore, 'I think it would make a popular ending if your heroine's heart were to melt at the sight of her father. She could swear to forgive, in touching language, that must bring tears into the eyes of the sympathetic reader. Not only does this most self-sacrificing daughter fall into his arms in the excitement of the moment, but herself solemnly declares that she will follow him to the other end of the world. There they'll dwell in fairy-like fashion and "live happily ever after." It sounds ideal, but in real life, of course, it could hardly be the case.'

"'Why not, Miss Meredith?' asked the man, leaning forward anxiously to scan her face. 'Now we will say that the case is reality; it steps from the realms of fiction and faces us as a fact. What then? You shall be the judge!'

"'You ask my personal opinion? Well, I will give it, though you may call me harsh, unnatural, cold. But I have a keen sense of justice, and my sympathies do not go with your prodigal. I believe in everybody reaping what they sow. Either the man should suffer in silence, and never let the shadow of his crime darken the daughter's life, or die. After all, if I were writing that story, I should say the man had better die. There is really nothing else for him to do.'

"'But,' he persisted, 'if it were true, and the man lived?'

"'Then the daughter might rise up and kill him, to revenge her mother's shattered life and early death. Or better still, to save herself from hanging, give him up to justice.'

"'You really think that?' cried the man, and his voice sounded husky and harsh. 'You would relegate him to his far-off home in lonely solitude? There would be no place for him in his daughter's heart, no corner for his loveless soul? Judging by yourself, it would be wiser that he should stay away and never seek her out. A sad ending truly to the story—a just ending!'

"He laughed bitterly, but his eyes were moist with unshed tears. Moore was busily putting the last touches to her work, she did not see his pained expression.

"'There!' she exclaimed at last, with a sigh of satisfaction. 'It is finished. Come and look. I am satisfied. Is that very conceited?'

"'It is saying a great deal,' he replied stonily, as he rose and went to her side.

"He hardly glanced at the striking portrait of himself, his gaze was fixed steadfastly on the face of the girl in the picture.

"'Who is that?' he asked, under his breath.

"'I took it from an old miniature of my mother. She is beautiful, indeed.'

"'Have you done with me?' he asked coldly.

"'Quite, thank you.'

"'It is ended, like my story.'

"'Yes; and if ever you write that idea as a book, don't let the old ruffian return and impose on his daughter. It would be far more artistic for him to die. I like a sad conclusion.'

"He bit his lip and moved away.

"'I hope,' she said, 'you will come and sit for me again some day.'

"'No,' he answered sadly. 'I am going away abroad, to-morrow, perhaps.'

"'I am most grateful for your services, but your sitting was arranged in such a hurry, we did not settle about terms. Please accept this.'

"Moore pressed some gold into his hand, and opened the door for him to pass out.

"He faced her with flashing eyes, and spoke contemptuously:

"'I don't want your money, not a farthing of it.'

"He flung the coins fiercely at her feet, and with a satirical laugh that sounded like a sob, rushed from the house, muttering bitter words.

"She gazed at him in speechless surprise, and turned to her picture.

"There it stood, the portrait she had unconsciously painted of her father, whom she believed dead—the mother's face at his side, vividly portrayed by the daughter's hand.

"'The only thing for him to do was to die!'—Moore had said it—and the words resounded in his ears like a death knell, when he went as he came—a stranger and unknown!"

Colds in the Head a Cause of Catarrh.

The medical explanation of the causes and symptoms of catarrh is an interesting item of a quarterly medical Journal just at hand. The Editor is anxious that people should understand the serious consequences which may result from neglect of a cold or of a series of colds in the head. In fact, the beginning of many of the most obstinate forms of catarrh can be traced to what the patient thought a simple cold. This fact is emphasised by a series of cases taken from the records of the Drouet Institute. These cases also serve to illustrate the treatment of catarrh by the Drouet Method, which the Editor points out has been successful in a large proportion of instances after operations and other special procedures have failed. Names and addresses being given, this issue of the "Review of Ear, Nose, and Throat Diseases" will be of use to everyone who has any form of catarrh. A free copy of the "Review" can be obtained by addressing the Secretary, Drouet Institute, 10, Marble Arch, London, W. The "Review" also contains a Special Report Form by means of which anyone can obtain free advice as to treatment. The Editor advises patients, however, when possible, to visit the Drouet Institute, for a personal consultation with the medical staff. Consulting hours are—in the morning, 10 to 12, and in the afternoon, 2 to 4, week days only. A fee of five shillings is charged for personal consultations.

Woman's Fault.

The Maid: "Whose fault is it if women lead aimless existences?" The Man: "Woman's, of course. They ought to practise throwing."

No Chance for Him.

He: "So you don't know that if I might linger by you for ever I should be another man?" She: "Well, it will be another man that does linger there."

Precisely!

"Just by way of a hint, you know, I told her she looked sweet enough to kiss." "Well?" "Well, she said that was the way she intended to look." "And so——" "Precisely."

A Sensible Girl.

He (timidly): "Now that we are engaged, I—I presume I may—may kiss you as much as I please, mayn't I?" She (encouragingly): "Yes, indeed. Make the most of your time, dear. There's no telling how long an engagement will last nowadays, you know."

Equal to the Occasion.

Mr. Shoddy: "Yas, that's the armah used by my ancestah who came ovah with the Conquerah." Young Lady (after examining the armour carefully): "It says 'Made in Germany' on the gauntlet." Mr. Shoddy: "Oh, yes. My ancestah—er—started from there, don't yer know."

What Papa Said.

Mr. Slimpurse: "Wha-what did your pa say when you told him we were engaged to be married?" Miss Beauty: "He was awfully kind. He said if you would call for him to-morrow with a brougham—I think he said your brougham—he would go with you to look at the Bayswater mansion you think of buying for me to live in."

Dangerous Ground.

He: "Jolly conservatory, Miss Matchems, isn't it?" She: "Yes; quite renowned for the number of proposals that have been made here——" He: "H'm—yes. By-the-bye, they're beginning to waltz." She: "It was here that Charlie Gudgeon proposed to Miss Pyke. They were sitting here, just as we are now, and he said, quite abruptly, just as you might say to me, 'Will you be mine?' and she said, as I might say to you——" He: "Ah, yes—quite so; but hadn't we better have a spin round?"

Poor Miss Clara!

The Young Rector (in evident embarrassment): "My dear Miss Clara, I"—trying to leave his chair—"I believe I have formed an—attachment, and——" Miss Clara (blushing furiously): "Oh, Arthur—I mean Mr. Greene—this is so unexpected. I must——" The Young Rector (frantically): "I Beg pardon, Miss Clara; but I was about to say I have formed an attachment for this chair, due to the presence of a bit of cobbler's wax placed here by that unregenerate brother of yours." (Intense delight of the small boy in ambush.)

She'd Stolen his Property.

"Sir, you have been following me for an hour!" "Quite natural, miss. You've stolen my heart!"

Couldn't Marry More.

She: "Ada has married one man out of a thousand." He: "Well, how many did you expect her to marry; two or three?"

Didn't Like a Coolness.

He: "Why do you flutter that fan continuously?" She: "Do you object?" He: "I object to anything that could produce a coldness between us."

Sure Signs of Industry.

"Claudia, is the young man industrious to whom you are engaged?" "Industrious? Why, papa, he intended to propose to me a month ago, but was too busy."

Just the Man!

The Heiress: "The man I marry must be very handsome, afraid of nothing, and clever. Money's no object to me." Mr. Broke: "Doesn't it seem like fate that we should have met?"

The Sound was Similar.

When a certain Liverpool young lady parts from her young man, who is too bashful to understand the nicer usages of his position, she says: "William, if you were to kiss me, you might be afraid ma would hear it; but if I creak the gate, she won't know the difference."

Spoilt the Compliment.

The Professor: "I declare, Mrs. Blombard, you look as young as your daughter." Mrs. Blombard (much flattered): "Do you really think so, professor?" The Professor: "Yes, indeed. No one would ever believe there was such an extraordinary difference in your ages."

She Wasn't Asleep.

He had come upon her dozing on a sofa, and when she woke up, she accused him of stealing a kiss. "Well," he said, "I will admit that the temptation was too great to be resisted. I did steal one little kiss." "One!" she exclaimed indignantly; "I counted eight before I woke up."

Old Beaux Were No Use.

"You are an iceberg!" exclaimed her elderly but well-preserved adorer, pale with anger and mortification. "A dozen Cupids, with a hundred arrows each, could never find a vulnerable place in your heart!" "Not if they used an old beau to shoot with, Mr. Wellup," coldly replied the young and beautiful Miss Flyppe.

Silence was Safer.

"What if I were one of those husbands, my dear, who get up cross in the morning, and bang things about and kick everything over just because the coffee is cold?" "John," responded his wife, "I would make it hot for you." As her words admitted of more than one interpretation, John said nothing about the coffee.

Double Pressure.

Mr. Pendragon weighs eighteen stone. He called on Miss Flyrte the other evening. "Oh, Mr. Pendragon," she said, "I am so glad to see you. Would you mind sitting in this big chair? I put a portfolio of seaweeds underneath the cushion yesterday." And later in the evening Mr. Pendragon suggested that she should help him press them.

Not the Only Reason for Moving It.

"Darling," said the young man, as he tenderly raised the lovely head from the place where it had rested an hour or more, got up, sat down again on the other side of the beautiful maiden, and once more drew the golden curls to his bosom, "you have no objection to a slight change of position, have you?" "No, Alfred," she murmured softly, "your heart is on this side." "Yes, my angel," responded the young man, his voice trembling with deep feeling, "and my waistcoat will now get worn alike on both sides."

An Unwise Trick.

"I MEET a man every day in the street," writes "DAISY," "and have taken such a fancy to him. He looks as though he feels the same towards me. How can I get to know him? Should I drop something in the street, and let him pick it up, or how?"

* * * * *

I would not do anything forward which you might afterwards regret. Perhaps he has set you rather on a pedestal, and would be shocked to think that you would have recourse to an obvious trick. I should wait until something happens which will really bring you together. If he is as keen on knowing you as you are on making his acquaintance, depend on it he will sooner or later find his way to do so becomingly.

A Lonely Man.

"How is a man to get to know girls?" asks "LONELY." "I live by myself in lodgings, but can never meet any nice girls—that is, of the kind a fellow likes to know. There are plenty of the other sort. Meanwhile, I am growing to feel lonely, and fear that very soon I shall be too old to attract the girls."

* * * * *

It must be in a measure your own fault, "LONELY," that you have drifted so apart from the other sex. Surely you have men friends who have sisters and cousins, and if they know you well, they ought not to fear introducing you. Why not try asking them? Failing that, join a church choir, musical or amateur dramatic society, tennis club, or some other institution where men and women meet socially. To meet the "right sort of girl" you must go to places where you are likely to find her, and must be able to attract her by some social qualities when you do meet her.

Shipboard Acquaintances.

"R. T." recently returned from a sea voyage. While on the ship he made the acquaintance of a married lady and her daughter, with whom he got very friendly. When they reached port, the ladies bade him farewell, and expressed pleasure at having met him, but said nothing as to his calling on them or continuing the acquaintance. As he got very friendly with the girl, should he take some steps to resume their acquaintance?

* * * * *

Of course you know that shipboard acquaintances are not necessarily life-long friends. To relieve the tedium of a voyage, people often become too intimate with their fellow passengers. But it does not follow that on getting ashore things are to continue on the same footing. If the married lady and her daughter had really taken a great fancy to you, they would certainly have given you an invitation to call on them, and the address and time at which such a call would be expected. Not having done so, you must take it that they did not regard you as other than a temporary acquaintance.

Should Husbands Play Cricket?

"GERTY" was married at Christmas. Until last month, her husband was scarcely ever away from her, and very rarely saw his male friends. Now that the summer has come, however, he often goes cycling or cricketing with them in the evenings or on Saturday afternoons, and leaves his wife at home. Do I think this is right? "GERTY" has not yet complained about it, but thinks she has a grievance.

* * * * *

Well, I don't think he ought to give up all his Saturday afternoons to his men friends, while he has a young wife who would like an outing as well as he does himself. If he goes cycling, or walking, he ought to arrange for you to be his companion. As to occasionally cricketing or cycling in the evenings, well, I don't think you ought to grudge him a few hours' necessary recreation in the summer, provided he does not carry it to the extent of leaving you alone too often.

* * * * *

A man ought not to entirely neglect his old "pals," and a little of their society ought to rather benefit your married happiness by making him feel that he is still a free agent. Have you not a few girl friends whom you could visit or go shopping with while your husband is on one of his outings?

A Rejected Man's Woes.

"I WAS very friendly with a girl," writes "F. T.," "and we used to go out together a lot. Then she went away for a holiday in the country. There had been a slight coolness between us before that, but I put it down to ill-health on her part. Now she has returned, and when I met her in the street the other day she cut me dead. I have since seen her about with another man, and she never looks at me. One day, I got so madly jealous that I stopped her while with him, and tried to speak to her. To my surprise, the man turned round, and said that if I dared interfere with the girl he would knock me down. How can you account for her amazing conduct?"

* * * * *

I think she has treated you very badly indeed, but for your sake think matters may be for the best. Evidently the girl took a dislike to you as a result of the "coolness," and while on her holiday met a man with whom she fell in love. When she saw you, she was probably afraid to meet you and tell the truth, so thought it better to cut you outright. It was harsh, but perhaps she preferred that way to deception. You should not have tried to speak to her against her will, while with another man. It was undignified. Always avoid scenes in public. They are rarely forgiven.

The Boarding-House Young Man.

"ELSIE" is receiving attentions from a young man in a boarding-house. He is something in the City, and has travelled a great deal. Should she encourage him?

* * * * *

You ask my advice in strict confidence about the young man. Don't think me unkind if I am quite candid about him, but I don't quite like your description. I may be wrong, but I seem to know that young man. He is a very regular frequenter of the boarding-house of the kind at which you are staying. He has generally travelled a lot, talks delightfully, knows how to pay a compliment, is free with his money when out with you, and is—something in the City.

* * * * *

He may be thoroughly genuine, but I think the majority of young men of the cosmopolitan order are seldom matrimonially inclined, and carry on such flirtations with every pretty girl they meet. Further, just get your brother or somebody you know to make a few inquiries about his position in the City before you let him squeeze your hand again, and get to know something about his family antecedents before you next turn those pleading grey eyes upwards to his in a glance of half affection, half doubt.

PROGRESS.

This Trade Mark appears on every Gramophone and every Gramophone Record.

A NEW KIND OF GRAMOPHONE RECORD.

THE "MONARCH" OR 12-INCH RECORD, PRICE 7/6 EACH.

In placing before the public this Catalogue of the first twelve-inch Gramophone Records ever issued, we wish to call attention to some of the many advantages which a Record of this size possesses over discs of a lesser diameter. Not only does the Record play considerably longer, averaging about four minutes, but, owing to the less acute curve which the sound waves are called upon to traverse, the sounds are reproduced with even more exactness and truth to nature than is possible in a ten-inch Record, perfect as the latter are. A twelve-inch Record is not necessarily louder; it is in the quality and breadth of tone that the improvement is most noticeable. Furthermore, in a record of this diameter, it is possible to reproduce in the minutest detail all those little delicacies of treatment which true artists impart to their work. Without hesitation we say that the twelve-inch Record marks a great and distinct advancement in the science of sound recording and reproduction.

SHORT STORIES

No. 756.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending June 27th, 1903.

A Dangerous Suitor.

A STORY OF LOVE AND JEALOUSY.

Containing the incident depicted on the cover.

A Woman and Two Men.

"CAN you tell me the way to Thurston?"

The questioner was a young man in dusty, but well-cut tweed garments, a peaked cap of leather, and high-leather leggings, and he balanced, as he stood on the edge of the wild moorland road, a much muddied, yet swift and powerful-looking motor-bicycle. The grey-bearded Yorkshire farm-hand, whom he had accosted, scanned the machine and its owner with a kind of disdain.

"Thurston!" he said, in the broad dialect of this county, "you're in Thurston." And he relapsed into his stare of silent disdain. The cyclist laughed and glanced about him at the prospect of low, dark hill-sides and sweeping, deserted road, rendered more melancholy by the cloudy warmth of the summer afternoon.

"That's all very well so far as it goes," was his tolerant answer; "but I suppose there's some sort of a village that calls itself Thurston? And then there ought to be a big rock hereabouts—at least if this is the Thurston I've been making for."

The other shrugged his shoulders.

"Humph!" the cyclist was told. "I reckon it's the Stone you want. You're not the only one that's come a fool's jaunt to see it. It's no rock—only a big pebble on the lip of a hole. I wouldn't go a dozen yards to see it."

The cyclist put a shilling into the speaker's withered palm and slapped him on the back.

"All right, Father Christmas," he said cheerfully, "every man to his taste. But you might show me how I can get to the Stone—then I can make up my mind what I think of it."

The old Yorkshireman chuckled with unexpected good temper and, pocketing the coin, pointed up a hilly footpath that diverged from the main road.

"Go up the brow there," he directed, "the Stone's just over it, in front of you. And I wouldn't go far on that thing of yours, for there's a nasty drop on the other side of the Stone and the path winds a bit to get by."

The cyclist nodded and sprang on to his machine, to pedal a few yards before touching a lever. The motor began to cough loudly, after its fashion, a whiff of petrol floated back on the air, and Allan Menzies, house-surgeon of St. Anne's Hospital, London, was sailing up the indicated slope as easily as if it had been down instead of up-hill.

A length or two from the crest of the hill he touched the lever once more. Another instant and the bicycle was over the rise. A low whistle broke from the young surgeon's lips, his fingers went to the brake-handle in a flash, and the heavy cycle, run deftly on to the soft moorland at the rim of the path, slowed sharply. Allan Menzies got off.

Before him was an abrupt descent in the reverse slope of the hill, a descent falling almost perpendicularly to an irregular hollow. The bottom of the hollow was eighty feet below, and held a wide, wind-ruffled pool that opened out in shallowing stretches to the lower levels of the moor.

On the lofty verge of the descent, whose height and sheerness might have entitled it to the name of a precipice, was poised a huge, flat-topped boulder, of the species known as "rocking-stones."

The young surgeon leant his machine against a bank and mounted the great slab. It oscillated beneath his weight, threatening to plunge him into the depths below. But he did not wince—he was an enthusiastic student of archæology, and he understood that the Stone was firmly fixed on its unstable base.

Centuries before, according to tradition, it had been a Druidic altar, on which human sacrifices had been offered to the God of Thunder, and as Thor's Stone it had given its name to the neighbouring village.

Allan Menzies sat down upon it and contemplated reflectively the surrounding panorama. Not far off, round the foot of the hill, he could see the roofs of the village and the tower of a tiny church. Higher up, on the flank of a commanding hill, and incircled by an ugly fenced park, was a gaunt, grey house, with tall gables.

The cyclist produced a red-backed guide-book, laid it on the Stone, and planting his elbows on either side of it, and resting his chin in his hands, leisurely perused a page.

"'Thurston-by-Ottery,'" he read, "'a small village and perpetual curacy in the parish of Ottery, known for a rocking-stone, said to have been used as a Druidic altar, and for other archæological remains. There is a picturesque little church, dating from the seventeenth century. The present holder of the curacy is the Rev. Octavius Vaughan, M.A., author of "The Druidical Monuments of Thurston," and other works. Ottery Hall, near here, is the seat of Mr. Cunliffe Frobisher, J.P., and a severely plain type of Yorkshire manor-house. The high-road does not pass through the village, but may be regained by turning to the left, opposite the Green Man Inn.'"

The reader checked the swift, scarcely-audible murmur in which he had been running over the various items of information. He had been interrupted by an exclamation. It came from a point below where he sat, and yet it seemed to be close to him.

"Please! Please! Mr. Frobisher!"

The voice was a woman's, and the inflection—at once pleading and protesting—was unmistakably girlish. Allan Menzies, struck by the repetition of a name he had just read, raised his eyebrows, and, drawing himself to the edge of the Stone, peered over.

Below him, moving slowly by, and apparently too absorbed to notice the motor-cycle he had propped up in full view, were a man and a woman. They had come over the hill by the same route as had Allan Menzies, and were passing the Stone on their way into the valley.

The man was big, muscular, and smartly dressed in the garb of a country gentleman, though his full black beard and heavy features lent him the air of a gamekeeper. Over his arm were looped the reins of a weight-carrying bay mare.

The woman at his side was both youthful and pretty, her figure slender yet vigorous, and her girlishly-curling brown hair set off a dainty head. She was simply dressed and wheeled a none-too-new "ladies' safety"—the firm brown fingers on the handle-bar were full of character. Her companion halted and bent upon her a gaze that, to the unseen watcher, seemed almost ferocious in its passion. Allan Menzies, fearful of embarrassing them, had hesitated to reveal his presence.

"Miss Vaughan," said the horseman huskily; "you are very cruel. Do you not understand that it is an insult to me that you should persist in riding that machine, clumsy and worn-out as it is, rather than use the one I gave you."

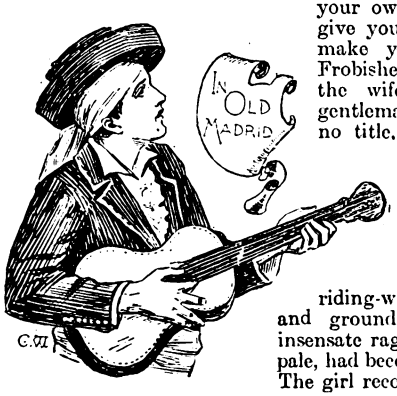
The person addressed shook her head.

"The one you offered me, Mr. Frobisher," she corrected; "I did not take it—I could not take it. You would not have it back, it is true, but I did not accept and I cannot use it. But I did not mean to insult you. And, oh, please let us talk of something else."

"Pshaw!" retorted her companion roughly, "we will talk of what I choose. I say that you insult me—me, the man who loves you better than anyone else can or will."

He silenced her by a fierce gesture, and when she would have passed on detained her by laying a hand upon the cycle she was wheeling.

"Your father's curacy," he continued, "does not provide a living for the proverbial church-mouse; I offer you, if not wealth, at least luxury and leisure. You were made to live in the sunshine—to travel, to see the world, to enjoy pictures, and music, and flowers, to wear pretty frocks, and ride in your own carriage. I can give you all these. I can make you Mrs. Cunliffe Frobisher, of Ottery Hall, the wife of an English gentleman, who, if he have no title, is the equal in descent of a dozen peers. Yet you refuse. Why? To spite me, to insult me, to thwart and trample on me."



He bent his riding-whip almost double and ground his teeth in an insensate rage. His face, from pale, had become a glowing red. The girl recoiled.

"I—I am very sorry," she faltered, "but really you are wrong. It is only because I do not love you—I do not love anybody like that. It would be wicked of me to say 'yes'—it would, indeed."

Cunliffe Frobisher started forward.

"No, it wouldn't," he cried; "you must say 'Yes.' I don't care whether you love me or not, I won't let anyone else have you. It would kill me. Elise, Elise, say you will marry me!"

Elise Vaughan sighed.

"I can't, Mr. Frobisher," she said. "I wouldn't marry any man I didn't love. I would rather die."

Her companion put out a pair of hands that quivered with passion.

"Suppose—suppose," he answered, "I gave you your choice—to die or to promise. You are killing me, Elise, what if I were to make short work of it all, and take you with me?"

Elise abandoned her machine and retreated—the expression on the countenance so close to her own was sinister in the extreme. He flung the impeding bicycle aside and advanced ominously. A cry burst from her lips.

The cry wakened Allan Menzies from his inaction. At a bound he leapt from the rock above on to the level of the path, and crossed, with an assumption of polite unconcern, to the motor-cycle that leant against the adjoining bank. Then he turned, lifting his cap to Elise.

"I—I fear I have been," he observed, "an involuntary eavesdropper on the conversation I have just interrupted. Perhaps, having regard to this gentleman's last remark, you would prefer not to—not to be left alone with him. In that case, I—I——"

He hesitated significantly. Cunliffe Frobisher uttered a terrible imprecation, but the young surgeon got out his pocket-book, and, with imperturbable self-possession, presented a strip of pasteboard to Elise.

"I am very much at your service," he continued; "as you see, though just now on a vacation, I enjoy the advantage of being that eminently respectable person, a professional man. May I offer you my escort as far as the—the village?"

Elise paused, undecided, yet attracted by his tact and friendly bearing.

"I—I am not really afraid of Mr. Frobisher," she said, "but I don't think he is quite himself at the moment. I—I will ride on."

Allan Menzies bowed, and proceeded to rescue her machine from the turfy roadside on which Cunliffe Frobisher had allowed it to fall. He delivered it to her gravely and stepped back for her to mount. She put her foot on the pedal, then glanced round at the two men. They were looking at each other in the grim English fashion that portends storm. She motioned to Allan Menzies—a girlish, half-beseeching gesture.

He understood and wheeled out his own machine. A faint, relieved smile flitted over her young features, as though she were pleased at his obedience. When she had ridden off he mounted quickly and the motor-cycle followed the shabby "ladies' safety" down the hill.

Cunliffe Frobisher remained standing. A little trickle of blood flowed over his bearded chin. He had bitten deeply into the flesh of his lower lip.

A Sudden Declaration.

"INDEED, Mr. Menzies, and I could wish that your stay in Thurston might have been extended. I assure you it is a great privilege for a hermit like myself to meet and converse with one who belongs to that outside world from which circumstances have isolated me and mine. Elise, my dear, give Mr. Menzies another cup of tea."

The Reverend Octavius Vaughan, perpetual curate of the chapelry of Thurston, was a small, spare man, in worn clerical garments, with a fresh complexion, fast whitening locks of ruffled brown hair and kindly, absent-minded blue eyes. He was lounging, as he spoke, by the open windows of a sunny country sitting-room, a half-emptied cup at his elbow, his spectacles between a finger and thumb, thoughtfully regarding the young house-surgeon.

Allan Menzies took his own cup to the little afternoon tea-table over which the curate's daughter was presiding. His hand touched hers as she possessed herself of the cup, but Elise did not look at him. Yet he could see, by a sensitive angle of her mouth, that her lips were quivering.

"The privilege has been mine, Mr. Vaughan," he said; "and I am loth to leave your quiet hermitage for the hurly-burly of the Big Village. Yet it must be done, my vacation ends to-day, to-morrow I must free my substitute at the hospital. But I want to carry off with me the book you so kindly promised me. Forgive my reminding you of it."

The other rubbed his thin, soft palms together.

"My dear sir," he answered delightedly. "I am honoured by your interest in the little volume. How could I forget it! Of course, of course, a copy of 'The Druidic Remains of Thurston.' Let me see, I have some copies in my study; you shall have one immediately."

"And if I may suggest your autographing it——" added his visitor.

"Certainly, certainly," said the archæologist, flattered, and he hastened off, adjusting his spectacles as he went.

Elise Vaughan was bringing the house surgeon his second cup of tea. He turned to meet, and take it from her. Their hands touched again—this time his closed upon both her fingers and the delicate china. Elise's gaze was still averted.

"Miss Vaughan," observed Allan Menzies, gently; "do me the favour to look at me."

His request was obeyed, slowly, and he saw that the large brown eyes were full of tears. He put down the cup of tea and clasped her hand in his own strong ones.

"Miss Vaughan," he said, huskily, "I have only known you a fortnight. Dare I—ought I—will you not think that I am paying you a very doubtful compliment, or will you—will you understand——"

Elise's head had drooped; he bent a tender glance upon it.

"Some men love once and for all," he said, "I have been too busy for flirtation, too busy even to realise, in the romantic sense, that I have a heart. But when I saw you I felt, in a flash, that you were the sort of woman I could love. I have lingered in Thurston, hardly knowing what I was doing, yet hoping to cultivate, as I have been audacious enough to do, our chance acquaintanceship. You have not shunned me, thank Heaven, and in the conversation which I overheard from the Stone, you said you loved no one, really."

He broke off, she had not changed her position, or offered to speak.

"I wonder," he murmured, "if you are only sorry for me. There were tears in your eyes a moment ago. Don't pity me, Elise, tell me I must think no more of you, if you must, but don't pity me—I could not bear it; I——"

He stopped again. Elise raised her head; her eyes were still wet, but she was smiling through her tears.

"I—I was pitying myself," she faltered. Allan Menzies came so close to her that she could feel his bosom heave.

"Why?" he asked her. Elise swayed to him as a young sapling sways before a wind too strong for it.

"Because you are going away," she said. Allan Menzies uttered an inarticulate cry, and clasped her in his arms. She sprang free of them just in time, her father was re-entering the room, and with him was a tall, broad-shouldered figure in riding-dress.

"Ah, Mr. Menzies," he exclaimed, "here is the book, and here is a friend of mine whom I have been wanting to make your acquaintance, only, somehow, you have not happened to meet. But I have spoken to him of you frequently. Mr. Menzies, Mr. Frobisher—Mr. Cunliffe Frobisher, a near neighbour of ours."

Allan Menzies stepped forward, with cool self-possession. The big Yorkshireman's face was flushed and twitching, and there was a glow in his black pupils that startled the house surgeon. It was a strange, wild visage that stared into his—strong with an almost uncontrollable strength, fierce with a well-nigh ungovernable passion

The calm glance of the young medical man encountered the other's ferocious one, and his brows contracted slightly. He recognised that his rival was on the verge either of a paroxysm of insanity or an apoplectic stroke.

Was it possible, he asked himself, that the big Yorkshireman had marked the interrupted embrace, and drawn his own conclusions? He could not be sure. In any case he must do something to relieve the intolerable tension.

"I am pleased to meet Mr. Frobisher," he answered, conventionally, "but I fear it was scarcely worth while troubling him with so brief an acquaintanceship. I am on my way out of Thurston at the moment," he added, turning to Cunliffe Frobisher, "I have lingered here all too long as it is."

The other murmured some commonplace of regret, and the surgeon addressed himself to his host, to relieve the curate of the promised volume.

"Yes," he continued, with a glance at Elise, "I was to have cycled back to London, but I have stayed so long in Thurston that I must avail myself of the railway—I hope to catch the night express at Leeds."

"Sixty miles," said Cunliffe Frobisher, more politely, "a rather heavy run, is it not, in so short a time."

"Not on a motor-cycle," replied Allan Menzies, gravely, pocketing the Reverend Octavius Vaughan's masterpiece, and shaking hands with him warmly. "Sorry I must say farewell, Mr. Vaughan, in such a hurry. I shall count on seeing you again one of these days."

"I hope so," said the little archæologist, heartily; "good-bye to you, Mr. Menzies."

The surgeon bowed to the stiff, black-bearded figure behind the curate, and took his departure. On the threshold of the room he lingered to clasp Elise's hand.

"Did you see his face?" she whispered, "he was just going to burst out—I am sure he is mad."

"Who wouldn't be, over you?" answered the surgeon lightly. "But see here, I'm not going like this, my darling. I can't speak to your father yet awhile, old folks don't take kindly to love at first sight. But won't you come and say good-bye to me? I have to go back to the inn, I will be in the lane by the church as soon as it is dark. I can get to Leeds easily over these roads in three hours and a half. You will come, sweetheart?"

Elise answered with her eyes. The answer satisfied Allan Menzies, and he went off, with a louder and more formal farewell. The big Yorkshireman, ostensibly talking to the Reverend Octavius, had been covertly watching the young surgeon.

Shows What Happened.

ALLAN MENZIES had been staying for a fortnight at the Green Man, the quaint old inn in the one straggling main street of Thurston. Bound on a cycling tour as far as the Highlands he had lingered in the Yorkshire village day after day, snatching, on one pretext and another, glimpses of the girl with whom such a singular circumstance had made him acquainted.

An audacious introduction of himself to her father as an amateur student of antiquities, and an admirer of those of Thurston in particular, had served a purpose he dare scarcely own to himself.

Digitized by Google

He had cycled with Elise, he had walked with her, he had gossiped and talked of books with her. But he had never spoken of love till the sight of those wet eyes—wetted by the thought of his departure—had surprised him into speech. He strolled back to the old inn, humming a gay air; he had never been so happy in his life.

Happiness and hunger are near cousins, and he attacked with an excellent appetite the meal he had ordered to await his return. He had made himself a favourite with the folks at the Green Man, and the landlord came and chatted with him as he sat at a table in the cool bar-parlour.

Little by little the day failed, and the dusk settled down on the Yorkshire uplands. Allan Menzies paid his bill, overhauled his cycle, lit the lamp, washed the grease and mud from his hands, and bade farewell to his host and hostess.

Springing into the saddle he pedalled off, touched a lever, and the coughing of the motor rose sharply on the night air. He sounded his horn as he swung round the bend beyond the inn.

Not far away the little spire of the ancient "chapel" showed duskily against the sky, he switched off the motor as he neared the end of the lane of which he had spoken to Elise. Turning into the lane he pedalled down it, looking for her. The high hedgerows darkened the lane, and he could not penetrate the shadows. He sounded his horn again, knowing that she would recognise the familiar teuf teuf.

A cry answered it—a cry in her voice. "Allan, Allan!" floated to his ears. The cry was far away down the lane, and there was terror in the girlish tones. He set over one of the small levers at his knee, and the cycle shot forward along the deeply rutted thoroughfare.

He heard the cry once more, faint and retreating, "Allan, Allan!" A superstitious thrill shook him, but he held on his course. It was dangerous steering, the ground beneath was bad, and the lane grew narrower.

Suddenly it ended. He had emerged upon the beaten path that crossed the moor towards the loftier crest and Thor's Stone. The moon was up, and by its light he caught a glimpse—or thought he did—of a horse and rider, moving in great bounds, like those of a flying thoroughbred, along the path. Nothing else broke the stillness of the rolling moorland.

Allan Menzies sounded his horn again, and again there came the cry of "Allan, Allan!" It floated back to him down the vague night breeze. He set over the gear lever of his machine, and the motor-cycle sped up the slope as only a high grade petrol-engine could have made it. It overtook the flying horse and rider, and he saw by the moonbeams a bearded face that glanced back at him. The rider was Cunliffe Frobisher, and he had something on his saddle-bow—something that struggled and screamed, in a voice that was the voice of Elise Vaughan.

The house-surgeon carried a revolver, as do many cyclists who tour much by night on lonely roads. He drew and loaded it.

"Stop!" he cried hoarsely. "Stop, you mad fool, before I have to put a bullet through you."

But the flying horsemen only laughed, and continued his desperate career. Elise, ceasing to scream, redoubled her efforts to free herself.

Nearer and nearer came the motor-cycle. Another instant, and it was alongside the galloping mare. The big Yorkshireman stared down at his pursuer with eyes of flame.

"You shan't have her!" he shouted. "You shan't! I will take her with me! You thought you had fooled me nicely, didn't you? But I heard, oh, yes, I heard, and I was waiting for my lady, here. Be still, you jade!"

He crushed Elise in his arms, and laughing wildly, urged the mare to her utmost speed. Before them loomed the crest of the hill, with the flat mass of Thor's Stone showing above it, and marking the edge of the cliff above the lake.

The slope of the hill eased somewhat, and the cycle, freed from the strain of the sharp incline, shot forward. As he came level with the galloping mare, Allan Menzies threw away his weapon, and snatched at the rein. It was the only way; he dared not risk a shot. Elise was in too close proximity to her captor. The house-surgeon had drawn up one foot, and set it on the edge of the front fork of his machine. With the speed of light, for his life depended on it, he loosed his handle-bar, and leapt high to clear his legs of the swerving cycle. It swung aside, and, hurtling into the dark of the moor, pitched over, throbbing loudly.

Allan Menzies clung to the mare's neck and hung on. The jerk at the rein had brought her round, she galloped in a new direction, dragging him with her. Cunliffe Frobisher struck at him savagely with a clenched fist, and shouted to the mare.

But the poor brute was winded and faltered in her stride. The young surgeon felt it, and swung himself up to grapple with the madman in the saddle. The other closed with him, and Elise, half fainting, slipped to the ground.

The struggle was brief. Allan Menzies was no match for his huge and maniacal opponent. He was hurled to the ground and the mare, frightened by the conflict thus suddenly terminated, plunged into the night with her rider.

Allan Menzies had fallen on soft turf, but one arm was doubled beneath him, and the shock had jarred his brains into a temporary dizziness. He recovered his scarcely-lost consciousness to feel a soft cheek against his own, and a pair of clinging arms about him. Elise, guided by the moonlight, had found her way to him, and his face was wet with her anxious tears.

* * * * *

Some farm-hands crossing the moor early the next morning, found and caught the mare. She was grazing near the edge of the pool in the hollow below Thor's Stone, her coat scarcely dry, her hoofs and legs muddy. Nor could she be easily induced to leave the spot.

A whisper of her owner's strange doings was already abroad in the village, for Allan Menzies had been carried back the preceding night to the parsonage with a fractured collar-bone, and a little party had set out from there at dawn to search the moors. The brute's attachment to its master was well-known, and her reluctance to leave the neighbourhood of the pool had in it something ominous.

Later in the day the sullen water was dragged, and the great hooks brought ashore the giant form of Cunliffe Frobisher. He had been drowned, but there were not wanting evidence of severe physical shock. Whether in his madness—for neither Elise nor her lover had any doubt that he was mad—he had ridden the mare into the pool from its lower bank, or had leapt her into it from the lofty platform of Thor's Stone, will never be ascertained.

Cunliffe Frobisher lies in the little burial ground of Thurston Chapel. His desperate wooing ended less horribly than he would have had it, but Elise and Allan, though they shudder to think of that grim struggle with the mounted madman, do not judge him.

His was a rarely passionate and ill-controlled nature, and he had been kind, in his own way, to the poor, and a just landlord to his tenants. Nor was he the first whom an ill-starred love had driven across the borderland of reason.

In all true love there is a spice of madness, let not those to whom Fate is kind judge those on whom she turns a sterner countenance. It is enough that his madness harmed none but himself. Elise and Allan are happy.

Ted: "Was it hard to tell Miss Prim you loved her?' Ned: "Not very. The hard part came in a month later when I had to tell her I had made a mistake."

Jane: "I shall marry no man unless he has strong temperance sentiments." Bess: "Of course not. You will want a man who isn't easily driven to drink."

Mr. Trotter: "Why did you place Foster and Bell opposite each other at dinner? Don't you know they are bitter enemies?" Mrs. Trotter: "That's just it. I did it on purpose. They spent so much time in glaring at each other that they couldn't eat much."

The Heart of a Stripling.

Telling of How it Was Broken and Mended.

Young Thorne rang three times before a little maid in cap and apron responded.

"Mrs. Redwood is out," she told him, "and Miss Redwood, too? No, sir, I don't know where she's gone. No, sir, there was nobody with her."

Thorne considered for a moment, looked up and down the road, and made off towards the river. Fifteen minutes later, with a sigh of relief, he pulled alongside a little boat which was being idly paddled down stream. He stared straight across the boat sides, from under his down-pulled hatbrim, into the face he had come to see.

"I'm here," he announced briefly, without returning the rather constrained smile of greeting she gave him. "I told you I'd come once more. You told me not to. I did not try not to. It wouldn't have made any difference if I had. I should have come just the same. May I get into your boat?"

"I suppose it would be of no use to forbid you." She was trying to speak lightly. "You are not good at obeying."

"It would be of no use at all," he declared stoutly, as he got quickly into her boat, and tied his own to the stern. "I must see you and talk with you, and you might as well let it be here. It's the most advantageous place for you," he added bitterly, with a keen look into her downcast face. "You can keep me at arm's length without half trying. I wish you couldn't," he added under his breath.

She answered nothing, and he took her oars and pulled along swiftly for a few minutes without speaking. Presently he swung the boat round into the mouth of a little creek which wound invitingly away from the broader river, beneath arches of overhanging elms.

"Not up there," she protested.

"Only a hundred feet or so," he told her determinedly. "Just round the bend. Surely you'll let me get you a little bit away from all these other boats. You don't want everybody to see my defeat, do you? They all know my case, anyhow.

"When I go by your row of cottages I feel those women's eyes looking right through me. I know what they're saying: 'There's that fool of a Lawrence Thorne, come up here to let Julie Redwood refuse him for the third time.'"

He drew his hat further over his eyes without looking at her, and pulled rapidly round the bend. There, under the shadow of a great down-drooping elm, he dropped the oars into the boat, and catching a branch held on lightly by it, while he faced his companion.

"Now, Julie," he said softly, "look at me."

Unwillingly Miss Redwood's eyes turned upon the young fellow's face. It was a fine one, handsome, with more than ordinary well-turned features, and pale just now with fixity of purpose. A powerful pair of dark eyes looked into hers with such ardour that her own drooped beneath them.

"Just let me go over it all once more," he pleaded. "No, don't shake your head. I can't help it. I must try this last time to make you see things as I do. I suppose all I said a month ago has gone for nothing. You haven't even thought about it in the interval, have you?"

Julie Redwood raised her head and tried to smile in a frank and friendly way.

"Surely I have, Larry," she said gently, "your words are not so easily forgotten as that. But—it hasn't made any difference."

"I knew you would say that," he told her, with a long breath. "I knew you would say it the minute I gave you a chance. I'd have been a fool to expect anything else. All the same I hoped——"

He stopped for an instant, twisting the branch he held with nervous strength, then finished with a shake in his voice, "I hoped, in spite of all, Julie, that I'd made you think of me just a little more kindly."

"I couldn't think of you more kindly, Larry."

"Yes, you could," the branch snapped in his hand as he spoke. "You call it kindness to say 'no' to me because you are older than I—older!—and I have to be with you and look at you, and hear you talk about yourself as old—you!"

Julie Redwood flushed rosily. Her exquisite, girlish-looking beauty seemed to sustain his words. But she faced him patiently, and began to say to him what she had told him more than once before.

"Larry, dear——"

"Don't call me that. You don't mean it."

"I do mean it. I've always called you that, and loved you"—the young man stirred impatiently—"as if you were my brother—better than I could love a brother. But, Larry, think. When you were a little fellow in dresses I——"

"Used to hold me on your lap—yes, I know—and curl my hair. I've heard it all a hundred times from everybody. Great Heavens! What difference does that make?"

Thorne flung one oar into the water, plunging it savagely to the bottom and seizing it as it came up as if it were the horn of his dilemma. "Honestly, what difference? You were fifteen and I was five; you were twenty and I was ten. Then I was fifteen and you were twenty, still. I was twenty—and you—were twenty!"

"You do my mind and heart great honour," she said quickly. "I stood still while you went on——"

"You know well enough what I mean," he interrupted, in his turn. "You are ten years older than I in knowledge, in accomplishments, in everything but appearance. But you don't look as old as I—and you won't," he went on hurriedly. "You won't. You need never fear that by-and-bye people will begin to see the difference. Look at your mother. Only last night I heard a man wager that she wasn't over forty-five."

There was silence for several minutes while Thorne waited with an odd shortness of breath which he tried in vain to overcome. Then Miss Redwood began once more, slowly, as if she were trying to think out her argument as she talked.

"Larry, dear—please let me call you that just as I always have—I don't know how to tell you any plainer than I have already, yet I can't make you understand. It isn't only that I'm older in years, and must be forty when you are thirty, and fifty when you are——"

"Forty, and a hundred when I am ninety. That's right, rub it in!"

She sighed and hesitated for a moment, looking down into the water, while her fingers absently pulled a water-lily bud into pieces. "It's more than that. You know how much I care for you——"

"Oh, yes, I know," muttered Thorne beneath his breath.

"I shall always care just as much. You are the dearest boy——"

"Oh, Julie!" cried the young fellow desperately, "spare me that, I used to like it, when I was a boy. I'm not a boy now, if I am only twenty-three. I used to be happy when you called me that and think it meant something. I know now it means about as much as a pat on a dog's head—to keep him quiet. It won't keep me quiet any longer. I'm not your 'dearest boy.' I don't want to be. I want to be your——"

"Larry!" she stopped him with a heightened colour in her cheeks, as his eager voice reached the dangerous word, so sweet to him, so unwelcome to her. "You mustn't say it. You can't be that. I've told you so over and over again.

"I try to make you realise that with all my love for you I can't love you—so. You make me have to put it very plainly; and I hate to hurt you, but I must. It isn't so much that I'm too old for you—it's that you are not old enough for me.

"It isn't your fault. Ten years from now you will begin to be old enough to marry a woman of thirty-three; but now—dear—can't you see? You are just a boy, and that—isn't enough for me."

The words had grown softer and slower and more gentle with each sentence; but Julie Redwood saw with an aching heart that each one had dealt a cruel blow.

Thorne winced beneath them like a lad under a lash; and as they ended, he suddenly seized the oars, flung them into the locks, and began pulling as if for dear life.

With his head bending and falling before her as he rowed, his mouth with its handsome curves compressed into one narrow, straight line, his unhappy eyes fastened upon the bottom of the boat, Thorne was trying to take his sentence like the man she had said he was not.

At last Miss Redwood broke the silence, beginning tenderly, "Dear, you will get over it——"

"Don't!" cried Thorne, so wildly that she stopped, frightened, and hardly dared to look at her young lover, rowing with a short, quick stroke which sent the two slender boats through the water like one long arrow.

She waited then, her heart beating fast, for she was really very sorry for the young fellow, whose boyish adoration had grown into this great and unmanageable passion.

For one pitying moment it seemed as if such love—immature as it appeared to her—might satisfy her from its very intensity, even though it lacked the qualities she longed for. But when Thorne spoke at last, the very words which deepened her pity for him hardened her heart against his suit, they were so characteristically boyish.

"I've tried all my life to please you," he pleaded, looking up into her face with eyes which made her own fill. "From a little lad I've thrown over my own will whenever you asked it.

"I learnt to play the violin—when I hated the bother—because you wanted me to. I went to college instead of into the warehouse with father because it was your wish.

"I kept straight all through, where lots of other fellows went to the devil, because you said you couldn't kiss any but clean lips. God knows what I've forsworn for the sake of those two kisses a year—one when I came home for holidays, and one when I went back."

His voice broke; with a hasty movement he drew one white flannel sleeve across his eyes. After a minute he went on a little shakily—

"You think me boyish, yet since eighteen I've had but one hope and one ambition—to get old enough and wise enough and worthy enough to win you. I've had little affairs with girls, of course—what fellow doesn't? But never for one moment has my ideal changed. Is that boyish? Five years of trying to grow fit for one woman?

"And now I've got myself ready for the work you wanted me to do, and have a good start and an independent income, to say nothing of father's promises. I thought when I reached that you would be pleased and proud enough to reward me. It's all I've lived for. And now you say I'm only a boy. What makes a man, Julie—only years?"

He was looking at her so despairingly that she felt it hopeless to try to comfort him. Yet she made one more attempt.

"Larry," she said, giving him one long look out of the beautiful eyes which were so dear to him, "I can only tell you that if you are still a boy, you are a very manly one, and I'm proud of you. I wish with all my heart I could give you what you want, even though I know it isn't best."

"You wish you could," he cried, wresting from her words one more vain hope which she had not meant to convey; "then do it, Julie—darling!—Listen——"

Regardless of possible onlookers, he dropped into the bottom of the boat, and grasping the hem of her gown pressed his lips to it, while he looked up into her face with eyes as beautiful in their pleading as her own—"Love you?—oh!"

It was almost a groan, and it hurt her tender heart as she realised how the boy longed for her. She had to turn her head away and steel herself to answer in a whisper, as she tried to draw him to his feet:

"I know you do, dear, and it's very sweet to me. You mustn't think I don't appreciate all you have done to please me. I do, and love you dearly for it. Nobody will ever be to me what you have been—in one way. But, Larry—I can't change my answer, and you must not ask me to again."

* * * * *

During the following years of travel with an invalid mother, Miss Redwood heard nothing from her old friend, Lawrence Thorne.

The morning after her arrival at their country home, the second year after Larry had left her with a gloomy last "Good-bye," she was early upon the river.

For some reason she found herself rowing towards the little creek, and as she did so, she caught sight of a boat slowly approaching her in the narrow opening. A pretty girl sat in the stern, and the athletic figure of a young man occupied the middle of the boat.

Something about the outlines of this figure struck Miss Redwood as strangely familiar, and as she looked more intently at it the young man glanced over his shoulder and their eyes met.

Julie Redwood gazed into a handsome, laughing, flushing face, with a light in the eyes so different from the melancholy expression she had so long remembered, that her first thought was one of reproach at his fickleness. But the next was a sense of relief that Larry was happy again, and a very genuine pleasure at sight of him.

Twenty minutes later Lawrence Thorne's boat, bearing only himself, raced up the waters of the creek, and touched sides with Julie Redwood's trim craft. She smiled into his joyful, anxious eyes.

"You're glad of it, Julie?" he asked breathlessly. "You wanted me to be happy?"

"Indeed I did, Larry."

"That's like you. Well, I am happy—happier than I thought I ever could be—that day—you know when. It took me a year to even begin to get over that. But I had to love her. She's like you in ever so many ways—she is, really; don't laugh. She is the sweetest—I am the luckiest——" He broke off, laughing shamefacedly.

"I'm so glad, Larry, dear; I can't half tell you," she began heartily, when the distant splash of oars made them both look up. Another boat was coming rapidly towards them, propelled by a solitary figure. As Miss Redwood recognised this gentleman, she blushed charmingly in her turn.

"Larry," she explained hastily, "this is—a—friend of mine who is coming. I'm glad to have you meet him. I must tell you—he is——"

"I see," whispered Thorne, laughing whole-heartedly under his breath. "Your face gives you away, Julie. Well, I'm glad—now. But tell me, dear—is he old enough to marry you—surely?"

"Yes," she whispered gaily back, rejoicing with her whole soul that the cure was so complete. "He's eleven years my senior!"

Then she waved her handkerchief, and Larry watched a fine-looking fellow whom he would have thought not over forty row up to them and greet his fiancée with a look of happy confidence. And so she introduced her friend to her lover, and the two men shook hands cordially across the boats.

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Below you will find twelve sets of letters, each of which contains the name of a Railway Station in the United Kingdom (not necessarily using all the letters). You must write (in ink), in the space left for that purpose, the longest name you can make by rearranging the letters.

The name containing the greatest number of letters will be the correct solution. If, however, more than one such name can be made out of one set of letters, each will be counted correct.

All the names will be found in the Index to Railway Stations in the January (1903) edition of Bradshaw's Guide. Should you be unable to obtain a copy of this Guide, a reprint of the Index will be sent to you for three penny stamps on application to BRADSHAW'S GUIDE, 59 Fleet Street, London, E.C.; or ROOM EIGHT, "SHORT STORIES," 17 and 18 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

The first prize of £25 will be given to the competitor who fills in the greatest number of railway stations under the conditions stated. The second prize of £10 will go to the person who fills in the next greatest number, and the other prizes will be awarded in order of merit.

When you have filled in all the names you can find, take out this page and keep it by you. Don't on any account send it to us until the closing date is announced in "SHORT STORIES."

In the event of a tie a further set (or, if necessary, several further sets) of letters will be submitted to the tieing competitors until one wins the first prize outright.

STERN DUTY.

Which Tells How a Woman's Love Foiled a Man's Pride.

BERYL CLYVE hastily ran down the steps of Taunton Lodge, then, as she reached the bottom, she turned to wave a laughing adieu to an elderly man who was watching her from the hall door.

"Good-bye, pater, dear," and she daintily kissed the tips of her fingers to him as she lightly stepped into the dogcart and gathered the reins in her hands with the skill of an experienced driver.

If there be any truth at all in elfin lore, then surely all the good fairies must have been present at Beryl's birth and given her simultaneously all good gifts, of which they generally only grudgingly bestow one or two on each child as it comes into the world; for she had grace and beauty, wit and cleverness, besides being liberally endowed by fortune.

Being the only daughter and heiress of the fabulously wealthy Mr. Clyve, whose immense warehouses were the busiest and largest in London, Beryl found herself the centre of an adoring crowd of suitors, but she persistently kept them at bay with her oft-repeated:

"Oh, I do not want to get married for another ten years, if I ever do make up my mind to desert my darling old pater, who spoils me so."

The only cloud in her bright young life had been the absence of a mother's love and care, and even then it is doubtful whether she ever fully realised the void, as she could not remember the delicate, frail young mother who had never lived to have the joy of bending over her baby's cradle.

When he lost his wife, whom he had passionately loved, Mr. Clyve centred all his hopes on his idolised daughter.

Past the carriage drive and between the massive pillars of the gateway the dogcart sped on its way to London, down the Richmond High Street, and on towards the busy thoroughfares of the Metropolis.

Beryl drove at the rather excessive speed which she was wont to drive even in the very heart of London; she was such a good hand at driving that it made her rather reckless. The groom leant respectfully forward and ventured to remonstrate.

"Be careful, miss, this is a nasty bit."

But Beryl turned back smiling.

"Don't be nervous about me, Burrows, I know what I am about."

Hardly were the words out of her mouth when a huge van, driving at furious speed from a side street, came full tilt right into the dog-cart.

The shock literally made Burrows fly from his seat to the ground, where he lay stunned by the violence of the fall; the reins were jerked out of Beryl's hands, and fell across the affrighted horse's neck; he snorted, reared his head aloft, and then, quick as lightning, bolted down the street at such a mad speed that the unfortunate Beryl was absolutely helpless to try even to check him.

Naturally a brave, high-spirited girl, Beryl did not lose her presence of mind; she resolutely held on to her seat. Once she tried to bend down over the horse's back and catch hold of the fallen reins, but this she soon found was impossible, and she felt she would only be thrown right over the horse and trampled under his hoofs.

It was an appalling sight to see this snorting, infuriated animal careering down the street, flying onwards to a terrible doom, while this beautiful girl, with hat blown off and her golden hair rippling over her shoulders, sat with strained, distorted eyes and clenched hands while a thousand thoughts sped through her brain.

It is a well-known fact that the speed of thought is quicker than any known mortal thing. Her whole life seemed to print itself so clearly on her brain; she felt an infinite pity for herself, as if she were embodied in another person and no longer Beryl Clyve.

"So young to die, without any preparation or warning! And her pater, oh, her poor darling pater, it would surely break his heart!" And though she had shed no tears for herself at the thought of him, a great dry sob escaped from her parched throat, and then in the intense agony of approaching death, she uttered one long agonised wail:

"Stop him, oh, stop him, for Heaven's sake!"

Alas! her appeal remained unanswered. In front of them everyone cleared the way, no policeman was at hand, and no brave man was to be found in that motley crowd of faint hearts to rush to the horse's head, and so attempt to save the life of the hapless girl who sped on at lightning speed to her awful doom.

By some extraordinary miracle the foaming animal did not collide with any other vehicle, but suddenly it dashed itself with fearful force against a lamp-post. A thundering crash was heard, the horse, panting and bleeding, stood still at last.

As for the unfortunate Beryl, she had been thrown out of her seat, and she fell heavily on the edge of the kerbstone; a slight moan escaped her, and then she lay perfectly motionless, apparently lifeless.

She was soon surrounded by a gaping throng; a young man pushed his way through the crowd, who made way for him, when he peremptorily announced:

"I am a doctor, let me pass."

He knelt beside the fallen girl and gently raised her head.

"She is seriously injured; make room all of you, let her have air," and he waved them back, while he raised the wounded girl in his arms.

Carrying the still unconscious Beryl, he walked deliberately to the opposite house, and into his consulting-room, resolutely shutting his door in the face of the crowd and police.

Very carefully he laid her on a couch and proceeded to examine the extent of her injuries. She had fallen with her face on the kerbstone, and was terribly cut and mangled about the eyes, nose, and mouth, a deep gash gaped right across her forehead.

Poor Beryl! No one would have recognised the beautiful, smiling girl who had left her home an hour ago; she was disfigured past all recognition; her lovely soft, silky hair hung around her tangled and soaked with the blood which flowed from her wounds.

"Poor child!" muttered Meredith Carruthers, as he gently washed away the blood and dust with antiseptics; "she is evidently quite young, and I think she must have been pretty, but now—I must try to save her from being disfigured at all costs. What a cruel blow it would be to a fair young girl if she were to have her looks spoilt for ever."

As he tended her he could not help putting her to a certain amount of pain, and this very consciousness of suffering made her heave a deep sigh, and her eyelids flickered.

Gently Meredith Carruthers passed his arm round her and raised her head. She opened her eyes, and as her gaze met his an exclamation of wonder escaped her.

"What has happened? Where am I? And——"

She stopped as a hot flush suffused her brow and cheeks when she noticed his arm supporting her, and she tried to raise herself and move further away on the couch, but the intense agony of the movement made her involuntarily cry out, and, helpless, she fell back with her head on his shoulder and her eyes closed once more.

He bent over her, and with a voice of infinite tenderness and soothing whispered:

"Don't be frightened, you have had an accident, and have been hurt, but I am a doctor. You fell at my very door. It must have been Providence which brought you under my surgery window, so that at least you can have medical attendance at once.

Beryl fell heavily on the edge of the kerbstone, and lay there perfectly motionless.

"Surely you are not afraid of me? My name is Meredith Carruthers. As soon as I have seen to your injuries I shall let your friends know of your accident, and they will come to fetch you."

Patients of Doctor Carruthers often said that they felt better directly they heard his voice, there seemed to be such a calming power in those tones, so gentle and yet so full of authority, as if sickness and pain must give way before him.

Beryl seemed to feel that strange sort of fascinating sway Meredith Carruthers exercised over all those with whom he came into contact. As she slowly reopened her eyes she let them rest trustingly on his, and with infinite tact he slipped the arm away which was supporting her, and putting an extra pillow at her back, continued to see to her injuries.

"Am I hurting you very much?"

"No, Dr. Carruthers, you are very good to me," she murmured.

"Nay, I wish I had been in time to save you. Will you stop here quietly while I tell my man to get you a cup of tea? I think you would like one, would you not?"

"Oh, yes, the very thing."

"Don't move till I come back. I shall only be a minute away."

What woman ever obeys orders! Beryl was no exception to this rule. Hardly had the young doctor left the room when she threw off the rug, and, struggling to her feet, in spite of the intense pain and of a sick feeling of faintness, she moved by leaning on various pieces of furniture, and placed herself in front of the mirror over the mantelpiece.

When she beheld the ghastly sight reflected there, her eyes bruised and bloodshot, her lip cut open with a nasty wound, her nose painfully swollen, and a horrible crimson gash right across her brow, no one would ever have recognised in this pitiful plight the lovely Beryl Clyve, the beauty of so many London drawing-rooms!

Beryl was not vainer than any of her sex, but she was only a woman after all, and what woman would have remained indifferent to the absolute destruction of her looks? With a piteous cry she swayed forward, and would have fallen to the ground if Meredith Carruthers, who had just re-entered the room, had not caught her in his arms, and carried her back to the couch, where he laid her.

"Now, this will never do; you must obey the doctor's injunctions." He spoke in an authoritative voice. "You are a most undisciplined patient!"

"Please forgive me, Dr. Carruthers. Don't scold me, I am afraid I repay your kindness very inadequately."

She put up her two hands over her face, as if ashamed of her weakness, or perhaps to hide her appalling ugliness even from his sight.

"Will I remain thus? Am I disfigured for ever?"

Meredith Carruthers was possessed of a very tender, sympathetic heart; he had often been heard to say that he never operated on a child without feeling intense pain at having to inflict suffering on this little unconscious being, who could not understand what was really for its good.

Beryl's distress now keenly appealed to him.

"Poor child, do not fret; you will look bad for weeks, nay, perhaps for two or even three months; but the injuries are not deep, the skin will heal and grow again, and you will not be disfigured."

In spite of this emphatic assurance she remained with her face buried in her hands, and did not move except to murmur.

"Oh, yes; I suppose you are just saying this to comfort me: Just a sort of doctor's promise!"

He bent over her, and taking her two little hands in his, drew them down from her face.

"No, I never make what you call doctor's promises. When I cannot tell the truth to a patient I say nothing. Won't you trust and believe me when I tell you that you will certainly not be disfigured if you follow my instructions implicitly?"

She glanced up, and looked straight into his honest, loya eyes, and all her doubts fled; it seemed so impossible not to put faith in his word.

"Yes, I believe you, Dr. Carruthers."

"When your people remove you from here they will, no doubt, put you into the hands of your own family physician, and you will naturally follow his prescriptions; but you must never omit to use this ointment which I shall give you; rub it on your face morning and evening for two months, till all the scars disappear. If you do this, I promise you no trace of your injuries will remain. Now you must take some tea," and he rose from her side as his manservant entered with the tray.

Meredith returned to the side of the couch holding a cup of tea in his hand.

"Oh, I can't possibly swallow it, my mouth feels so painful with this horrible gash on my lip."

"You must try," he said gently but firmly. "Come, I shall help you," and, filling the spoon, he held it to her lips.

As she swallowed the tea she winced with pain, but she bravely tried to please him by doing his bidding. The second spoonful did not hurt quite so much, and as carefully as he would have fed a child he applied spoonful after spoonful to her lips.

"Oh, how refreshing!" she said at last. "And how good you are to me. How can I ever repay all your great kindness? You do not even know my name or anything about me!"

"Well, it was more urgent to sew up your lip and bind up your wounds, was it not, than to put you through your catechism?"

"My name is Beryl Clyve. You must have heard about my father, Richard Clyve, the big City man?"

"Yes, everyone knows Richard Clyve by reputation at least. So you are his daughter? Well, our paths in life lie apart; I do not expect that you and I will ever meet again after to-day."

"Oh, please do not say that, we must always be friends; how can I ever forget all you have done for me to-day?"

"You will easily forget in the busy vortex of fashionable life."

"Never!" she said emphatically.

"Well, we shall see," and he smiled incredulously. "I shall never seek you out to remind you of your promise!"

"Well, then, I shall have to seek you," and a wintry smile passed over her poor distorted features.

"Now I must send my man to your father's office to tell him of your accident."

He was still busy applying lotions when the door burst open and Mr. Clyve rushed into the room.

"Beryl, my child! Oh, good gracious, what has happened to you?"

The agonised father was absolutely horrified to see her in such a state. Could this disfigured girl be his beautiful Beryl?

"Pater, dearest, don't worry about me," she murmured softly. "I shall soon be all right, thanks to this gentleman. Let me introduce you to Dr. Carruthers, who has acted the part of the good Samaritan to me. He says your little Beryl is not going to remain the hideous monster she is at present!"

Mr. Clyve turned at once to the doctor and warmly grasped his hand, exclaiming—

"God bless you, sir, for your kindness to my child!"

"I only did my duty." The young man bowed and retired discreetly to the window.

"Beryl, my darling," said Mr. Clyve, "I must have you moved from here at once. We must get the opinion of a really good physician. I do not expect this young fellow knows much."

"Oh, hush, hush, pater; if he were to hear you he would feel so hurt, and he has been so good to me."

"Well, but child, he may be very good, but that does not make him a clever doctor."

"He is clever," she asserted, "and I would rather trust to his diagnosis of my case, than to that of the greatest of London physicians."

"We shall see about that. Now I must attend to your being taken home."

He turned to Meredith Carruthers.

"There is, I suppose, no danger in moving my daughter at once to her own home?"

"No, not if she is borne from here lying full length in a carriage."

"I shall at once order one round, and also telephone for a couple of trained nurses to accompany her."

Mr. Clyve bustled out of the room; Meredith left the window and drew near the couch.

"Thank you, Miss Clyve, for so warmly advocating my humble skill, and especially for trusting me."

"Oh, Dr. Carruthers, you heard what my father said?" she exclaimed, horrified.

"I do not blame your father, it is his great love for you which makes him so anxious, and I do not wonder. But I shall never forget that you believed in me."

Shortly afterwards Mr. Clyve returned. A carriage with soft springs, a couple of nurses, everything which money can procure in London at a moment's notice, had been secured by Mr. Clyve. The nurses carefully lifted Beryl from the couch and bore her to the carriage. When she was comfortably settled, Meredith drew near to bid her farewell.

"Good-bye, Miss Clyve; don't forget about the ointment, I have given some to one of your nurses."

"Good-bye, Dr. Carruthers, we shall meet again soon, I shall want to renew my ever grateful thanks to you."

Mr. Clyve again shook hands with the young man, hastily repeated his thanks, and took his seat by his daughter's side.

When the carriage slowly moved on, Meredith returned to his surgery, and a half sigh escaped him.

"Fool that I am, I shall never see the girl again, and——" He stopped short, and a deep frown gathered on his brow as he caught sight of a ten pound note lying on his table.

"Confound it! I won't accept such a fee. I shall return it by post to Mr. Clyve."

Just then he espied on the floor a tiny rosebud and a sprig of maidenhair fern, which Beryl had worn tucked into the bosom of her dress. On the white rose lay one ominous red spot.

"There can be no harm in my keeping this," and he pressed the soiled flowers to his lips. He next addressed an envelope to Mr. Clyve, in which he inclosed the ten pound note. Then he hurried off to the hospital, and tried to dismiss from his mind all thoughts of Beryl Clyve; this was indeed a difficult task he had set himself to perform.

Days, weeks, and months slipped by, and Meredith Carruthers grew weary of waiting for tidings of Beryl. Her father had never acknowledged his note. He had been deeply hurt that Mr. Clyve had not asked him to look in and watch the progress of his daughter's case, and he was too proud to call at Taunton Lodge and inquire about Miss Clyve.

"Nay," he remonstrated with himself, "'tis best so. She and I move in different spheres of life, and 'tis better she should pass entirely out of mine."

Meredith Carruthers set himself to work with renewed energy; he thought, and rightly enough, that intellectual labour is the only panacea for all the troubles with which our frail human lives are assailed. Three months after the carriage accident Dr. Carruthers was busy in his study when James looked in.

"Please, sir, a lady to see you."

"All right, show her in."

A lovely girl entered the room richly clad in the costliest of costumes; an evidently expensive hat shaded the purest and fairest of faces, just then suffused in rosy tints.

She paused on the threshold, then, quickly crossing the room, she moved up to the young doctor with her hand outstretched. He gazed at her in such evident surprise that she stopped irresolute, and a pained expression overspread her features.

"Oh, Dr. Carruthers, you do not remember me!" she exclaimed reproachfully.

The silver tones of her voice were engraven on his heart, he recognised them at once.

"Oh, Miss Clyve, forgive me, your voice I knew at once, but your face——"

She laughed.

"Well, yes, I suppose you could not be expected to recognise my face. I was such a pitiful object the day you picked me up from the gutter, whereas now I am, thanks to you and your directions, fairly presentable. I might pass in a crowd—don't you think so?"

And she looked at him with the sweetest and most girlish coquetry. She knew she was beautiful, and she wished this one particular man to bow before her sovereignty of beauty. Little cared she what tribute the whole world paid her if Meredith Carruthers did not think her lovely.

Enraptured he gazed at this vision of pure, womanly loveliness, which seemed by its presence to shed a halo of glorious light in his dingy study.

She gracefully dropped into a chair and loosened her wraps as if she meant to make herself quite at home.

"Tell me now, Dr. Carruthers, did you not think me an ungrateful wretch all these long months, that I never gave you sign of life?"

"I had no right to expect anything else, Miss Clyve."

"Oh, but you know, I promised to come back and thank you!"

He did not answer, he was too proud to acknowledge how often he had thought of this promise of hers.

"Then you did not wonder why I never came, why I never wrote to you? If I had not come now you would not have cared! In fact, from the day I left your house you never cast another thought on me?" She spoke in low, rapid tones, but there was an angry quaver in her voice.

It was the first time that any man had appeared so absolutely indifferent to the beautiful, wayward, spoilt child of fortune.

Suppose this damsel in distress had lost her heart to the knight, what then?"

"No, Miss Clyve, you are wrong. I thought of you again and again, but our stations in life are so different that I felt it was best that we should not meet again."

"Why?" she asked.

He smiled somewhat sadly.

"Did it not strike you, Miss Clyve, that even a doctor has a human heart, and—but this, of course, is only a ridiculous supposition—that a doctor might lose the heart he is generally not supposed to possess at all to a beautiful damsel in distress, whom a casual chance had allowed him to succour. Of course, I repeat, this is only a mad, impossible supposition."

She lowered her eyes, and began toying with the end of her sable boa.

"Suppose this damsel in distress"—she spoke very low, and never raised her eyes to his—"had lost her heart to the knight who had been so noble, chivalrous, and good to her, that during the many weary days and nights when she could not come to him her thoughts had dwelt ever on him, what then?"

He grew pale to the lips, a great longing seized him to take this lovely girl in his arms, and tell her how passionately he loved her, how he had yearned for her return, but he controlled his feelings, and in a cold, hard voice, replied:

"Supposing such an impossible thing had happened, it would be the stern duty of this young man to inform the rich young heiress that she had allowed her romantic feelings and an exaggerated sense of gratitude for a very small act of kindness shown her to blind her to the true state of things, and to imagine herself in love with a person totally unsuited to her.

"The difference of fortune between them would be an insuperable barrier never to be got over. No self-respecting man would ever consent to wed a woman rolling in gold, while he himself had nothing."

"Not even if he loved that woman, and if he knew she loved him, and that she never could be happy with any other man?"

"He would bid her forget her romantic fancy for him, sprung from a certain chain of circumstances. In her own set she would soon meet a man more suitable to her in every way, she would marry him—and forget the other."

She did not answer, and there followed a few minutes of absolute silence between them, then she looked up.

"What a long way our digression on 'might have beens' and suppositions has led us," and she laughed rather nervously, "and I have not yet told you why I remained so long without writing or coming to thank you.

"Well, when pater got me home he had tip-top London physicians down to see me; I expect they proved too much for me altogether! You would have taken far better care of me." She paused to see if he would acknowledge the subtle flattery, but he took no notice, and she proceeded:

"Whatever the real cause (they said it was the terrible shock I had experienced), but that very same night I became delirious, and the next morning I was pronounced to have brain fever."

"Good Heavens! and I knew nothing of this—you might have died!"

"Would you have been sorry?" she asked gently.

He turned his face abruptly away from her.

"How can you ask such a thing?"

"I do not know; I thought perhaps you might be like the young man of our recent suppositions, and that stern duty might veto your being oven sorry for the luckless heiress!

"Well, to make a long story short, for nearly three weeks I lay between life and death; mercifully one of my nurses to whom you had given instructions about the ointment applied it morning and evening, and so my beauty was not quite spoilt! Was it, now?" and she turned her glorious azure eyes full on him.

He could not help laughing.

"Poor Miss Clyve, if you are fishing for compliments, I warn you, you are fishing in muddy waters—I do not know how to pay compliments like the gay Society men to whom you are accustomed!"

"Well, Dr. Carruthers, you are mean; but never mind, I must proceed with my story. When I was at last pronounced to be out of danger, the doctor declared a change of air to be absolutely imperative. Then we went to France and Italy. I had never seen Rome, and after a time I begged of pater that we should go there.

"Hardly had we been in Rome a week when my darling pater caught malarial fever. He was dangerously ill for weeks, I watched by his bedside night and day. Thank God he recovered, but the convalescence was long. We moved to Mentone as soon as possible, so that we have only just returned to London."

"What a terrible strain you have had through all those weary months!"

"Yes, indeed. Often I thought of writing—nay, I think I must have begun about twenty letters, but I did not know how to write to you." She hesitated and blushed. "I tore them up and made up my mind I should come to see you as soon as I returned to London. We only arrived last night, so you see I have lost no time."

He bowed.

"It was very good of you, Miss Clyve."

She rose to go, but seemed half reluctant to do so, and lingered over the rearranging of her boa.

"Won't you come and dine with us quite in a friendly way, Dr. Carruthers?"

"No, thank you, Miss Clyve, my professional duties never leave me time for any social functions."

She sighed.

"Stern duty, I suppose. You wish this to be our final interview, Dr. Carruthers?"

"Believe me, Miss Clyve, it is best so."

"As you will. Good-bye," and she held out her hand to him.

As he took it, a mad impulse possessed him to press this dainty little hand to his lips, but pride again mastered him, and he relinquished the hand which was so willing to be detained in his. Beryl stepped into her carriage while Carruthers, erect and stern-looking, stood by. She waved one last farewell to him, and then the carriage drove off.

"I know he loves me," she murmured, "so I don't care one little bit for his stern duty and all that rubbish. I shall conquer in the end——"

* * * * *

Another couple of months went by and Meredith Carruthers heard nothing more of Beryl Clyve.

One morning James ushered into his study a lady very quietly and unobtrusively dressed.

"Miss Clyve," exclaimed Meredith, in glad but astonished surprise.

"Yes, I am glad, Dr. Carruthers, that you have not quite forgotten me. I am in sore trouble, and I want your help and advice."

He scanned her white face anxiously.

"You may command my services, Miss Clyve. I shall do everything in my power to help you, though I am afraid I can do but little."

Still holding her hand, he drew an easy chair towards her, and she let herself fall wearily on the seat. She seemed terribly agitated and unnerved.

"Dr. Carruthers, can you advise me—I wish to begin training as a hospital nurse; how am I to go about it?"

He laughed incredulously.

"You, Miss Clyve? A hospital nurse?"

"Yes, I would rather do that than be a governess to exacting, spoilt children, or companion to some cross-grained old lady, and I must earn my bread. My father is ruined; to-morrow the whole of London will talk of nothing else—the failure of Richard Clyve's firm."

She stopped abruptly, and, hiding her face on the cushion, she sobbed convulsively. In a second Meredith Carruthers was kneeling by her.

"Miss Clyve—Beryl, my darling, do not give way so, this is terrible news indeed; but be brave—let me help you to bear the burden. If I am not absolutely repellent to you, give me the right to stand by you and guard you from all evil and trouble. Beryl, will you consent to be my wife?"

A long, shuddering sob was the only answer to this appeal.

"Beryl," he resumed sadly, "I know a marriage with me is but a poor lookout for you, but 'tis better for you than to battle your way alone in this hard, cruel world. I cannot bear to think of you, my delicate, dainty darling, struggling to earn your daily bread. Beryl, in pity to yourself, try to love me a little. I shall work and toil so for you if you will only grant me the privilege of doing so."

He put his arm round her waist and drew her bowed head down on his shoulder.

"Nay, Beryl, my darling, I shall not kiss you till you give me leave. Won't you give me an answer? Surely you cannot be so absolutely indifferent to me, when you yourself sought me out in your hour of sore trouble and need?"

"Oh, Dr. Carruthers, forgive me—I never realised how terribly hard it would be—but I love you so—I love you so!" she wailed out in piteous, broken sentences.

"Beryl, you love me! I thank God for this priceless treasure of a good woman's love," and he imprinted a kiss on her lips.

But this kiss seemed to burn her as if she had been branded with a hot iron. She sprang away from his incircling clasp and fled to the couch where months before she had lain while he tended her. He followed her.

"Beryl, what is the meaning of this? You say you love me and yet you shrink from me as if you hated me."

"Alas, it is you who will shrink from me when you know all. Doctor Carruthers, I am not a good woman, as you called me just now. I came to you with a lie on my lips."

"A lie from you, Beryl—why, it is impossible!"

"You have told me you loved me, you have asked me to be your wife, Meredith"—she breathed his Christian name very softly, as if almost afraid to use it—"nothing can alter that!"

"No, indeed, no power on earth or in Heaven!"

She flung herself into his arms.

"Oh, Meredith, do not spurn me from you when you know all; if I have done wrong, it is out of my great love for you. For weeks past I have dwelt on this one subject—how to conquer your pride and force you into telling me you loved me—and I planned the little scheme I have carried out, but it overwhelms me with shame to think of it; in theory it seemed so easy, in practice it makes me feel so despicably false. I told you a hideous lie. My father is not ruined, all I said to you just now was absolutely false."

Meredith Carruthers only her closer in his embrace

"Beryl, my poor child, I alone am to blame; it was my stubborn pride which drove you to take this step."

She gave a little gasp.

"Oh, Meredith, you will not cast me off, then; you will love me still?"

"My precious darling, a thousand times more than before, now that I realise the sacrifice your great love for me impelled you to make; your true, loyal nature degraded itself into telling this falsehood, no matter how abhorrent the action was to you, all for love of me! While I let my ungovernable pride rule supreme and tried to crush the cravings of my intense love for you—ay, and worse than all, I bruised and blighted your tender heart. Ah, Beryl, my darling, how much nobler you are than I am. It is I who crave your forgiveness for all I have so selfishly made you suffer."

"What nonsense, Meredith, and please don't go to the other extreme and make a heroine of me. It was all sheer selfishness on my part, because I simply could not do without you!

"And so, Dr. Carruthers," she looked up archly at him, "there is to be no more talk of stern duty."

"No," he laughed, "I see now that my stern duty lies another way, in the matrimonial line!"

A Question of Women's Rights.

Which Brought About the Marriage of Gerald Sinclair and Ethel Walrond.

ALTHOUGH I have from time to time described life at Laburnum Villa (inhabited by Mr. and Mrs. Gerald Sinclair), I do not think I have ever told you how these two came to meet one another, and finally to become engaged. I will, therefore, endeavour to set down to the best of my ability and remembrance this history.

It was in the early summer of the year 189—, one of the nineties, at any rate, that Gerald Sinclair was lazing aimlessly in the Park, when his shoulder was smitten violently in that fond way that our athletic friends have. When he had recovered sufficiently, Gerald turned round, his hand being grasped by a particular friend in the shape of Richard Cunnyngham, Esq., better known as Dick.

"Hullo, Gerald, my boy! Just the man I wanted to see!" An analysis of this speech will reveal the island of which the speaker was a native.

"What's up, Dick, why so enthusiastic?"

"It's like this, old chap! I've promised to take someone with me to-night to dinner at the Ansteys', and you're just the chap."

"But I don't know the Ansteys," protested Gerald.

"Of course you don't! They knew that when they asked me to bring someone, and I suggested your name. So you must come."

"Well, I haven't anything else on to-night, so I might as well."

"That's all right, then. After dinner Miss Walrond is going to talk on 'Women's Rights.'"

"Wh—at?" cried Gerald, who began to regret that he had agreed to go. "How disgusting! If there's anything I detest, it's the 'Women's Rights' woman."

"My boy, Ethel Walrond is a fair stunner. Jolly nice-looking girl, and a ripper to talk to. If it wasn't for that fad of hers she'd knock spots off any girl I know."

That is how it happened that Gerald dined that particular evening at 18 Carlton Terrace, and made the acquaintance of Miss Ethel Walrond in the following quaint manner.

There was a large crowd at the Ansteys' that night, several of whom Gerald knew, and a number more to whom he was introduced, but hadn't the faintest idea who they were.

Eventually he found himself alongside a young lady of prepossessing appearance, and there he decided to anchor. They conversed as is customary at these gatherings. First of the occasion, then of the weather, then of theatres, and then of anything they could think of. They were in that last stage when Gerald said with his usual bluntness,

"I understand some lady is going to make herself ridiculous after dinner."

"Oh!" rejoined his companion. "What is she going to do?"

"Speak about women's rights," replied Gerald in a very disgusted tone. "Much better if she'd stay at home and—and—er—and look after the children."

"I don't think Miss Walrond has any children to look after," came the answer, accompanied by a delicious laugh.

"Well, at any rate," answered Gerald, somewhat discomfited, "she oughtn't to make an exhibition of herself. One of these women who want to wear trousers and smoke pipes, and all that sort of thing, I suppose."

His companion leant back and gave vent to a peal of laughter.

"You are too ridiculous!" she gasped eventually.

"I'm quite serious," cried Gerald, to whom this subject was as a red rag to a bull. "I call it perfectly disgusting, and a disgrace to the sex for a woman to make such an exhibition of herself. I can imagine her—wears spectacles, short, straight hair, freckles, plain as they make 'em. That's like her, isn't it?" He had quite forgotten Dick Cunnyngham's description.

"Well, not very much. She doesn't wear glasses, and I don't think she has any freckles. She has quite a curly lot of hair too."

"H'm! Do you yourself believe in this Women's Rights business?"

"Oh, yes, most certainly I do!" quickly came the decided response.

"Really?" Gerald queried in a discomfited tone. "Well, I am surprised. Surely you don't think that woman should give up her sacred duties and go out and work amongst men?"

"I do, when a woman has nobody to fall back upon, as thousands have not. What is she to do, starve? Woman can keep womanly, although she works for her own living."

And then ensued a long discussion on that much discussed question, Gerald standing against it tooth and nail, laughing at its advocates, and particularly Miss Ethel Walrond.

They were only interrupted by the announcement of dinner. Dick Cunnyngham suddenly appeared saying Gerald was to take in Miss Walrond. Gerald's face became gloomy, and he turned to his companion saying:

"Well, isn't that rough on a fellow? I have to take in the person I object to most in this select gathering. It is a shame. And he gazed sorrowfully at his companion's sweet face.

"By the way," he suddenly said, "which is Miss Walrond?"

"I am afraid you happen to be talking to her just now," was the low reply.

"I—but I'm talking to you!" spluttered Gerald.

"Yes, and I am Ethel Walrond."

"Oh-h-h!" He had bitten the dust absolutely. Why didn't the floor open and swallow him? What an absolute ass he felt. He must say something or do something. But what could he say or do? All the time Miss Walrond was gazing at him with a very amused expression.

"You oughtn't to do it, you know, Miss Walrond," Gerald at last blurted out. What she ought not to have done was not very clear. "I'm awfully sorry, though. You see, I didn't think—that is, I didn't know—er—that is, of course—er—oh, let's go in to dinner. Unless you won't have anything to do with me now," he added as an afterthought.

That evening ranked in Gerald's mind as absolutely the most enjoyable of his whole existence. Notwithstanding the very vexed question of Women's Rights, which went very much against the grain, he managed to fairly well monopolise all Miss Walrond's spare moments.

At the conclusion of the evening there was some misunderstanding over the carriages, and Miss Walrond found herself without the wherewithal wherein to ride. This was Gerald's opportunity, and he jumped at it.

"Will you allow me to see you home?" he asked. "I have a hansom waiting, and I shall be only too delighted to help you along."

"But won't it be out of your way?"

"Oh, dear no," cried Gerald, "I go very close to your home!"

"It's very kind of you, I am sure!" she exclaimed as Gerald assisted her into the cab.

"Will you excuse me for one moment?" he said, and then rushed back into the house.

Oh, mankind! Verily thou art the flower of hypocrisy, and Gerald Sinclair, thou, too, art an orchid of the species. For why was it he begged to be excused? Simply this, that he might find out where Miss Walrond lived. And he had just assured her that his way lay quite close to where she lived. Oh, Gerald, Gerald!

Never would he forget that ride. To feel her so close to him. The very contact sent the blood tingling delightfully through his veins. To him, this very ordinary conveyance was a corner of Paradise. How he blessed that horse, too, which was very slow, and which moved slightly as he helped Miss Walrond out, which necessitated him clasping her with both arms to prevent her falling, and also meant half a crown extra for the driver.

Gerald lay awake that night, or rather morning, thinking. And when he did sleep he dreamt. The subject of both thoughts and dreams, it is needless to add, was Ethel Walrond.

Time went on; occasionally they met at garden parties, and once at a house-party up the river. The house they were both staying at was near by Marlow, and their sojourn extended to almost a week. Blissful memory! It was a remarkable thing that Gerald should happen to be catching the identical train back to town that his divinity did, but such was the case, anyhow.

"This time next week I shall be in the West of England," remarked Ethel, as the train sped on towards London, with what seemed to Gerald absolutely unnecessarily rapid speed.

"Will you really, Miss Walrond? What a strange coincidence, for I myself will be down there too. I shall be on a cycling tour." The excessively diplomatic Gerald, whilst intending to go away, had not at all made up his mind where to go until the last two minutes. He knew, too, that a cycling tour covers a multitude of towns, so that he could always turn up wherever he found it necessary to suit his desire.

Paddington was reached all too soon, and Gerald sorrowfully observed that the Walronds' carriage was there to meet his companion.

"I wonder if she really does care for me?" he mused. "She always seems pleased to see me and to enjoy my society."

This was entirely free from conceit, I can assure you.

However, Gerald saw nothing more of the girl of his heart until in the West of England he—but I am too hasty.

The Walrond family were bound for Lynmouth, where they generally spent a few weeks every year. Lynmouth is an ideal place, lying as it does on the border of two of the fairest counties in England—to wit, Somerset and Devon. There it is, too, that they that honeymoon abound.

Well, it came about that the Walronds duly arrived at Lynmouth, and proceeded to enjoy themselves to the best of their abilities. It also came about that Gerald started on his cycling tour through the West. His first day's ride ended at Chippenham, where he put up for the night at the old hostelry of Patterdown. And the next day, passing through Bath, Wells, Bridgwater, and Watchet, right across lovely Somersetshire, he arrived at Minehead.

Minehead is, or was at the time I write about, an old-fashioned, quaint West Country town, and here Gerald had elected to make his headquarters. Awaiting him at the "Plume of Feathers" was his portmanteau, forwarded there by his directions.

On the following morning, after an early dip, Gerald elected to have a run through the country round about and up on to Exmoor. He started away through Watchet and then bore sharply to the right, skirting North Hill until he was near to Lynmouth.

"I wonder if I might cycle in and call?" he said, apparently addressing a small sparrow, who, with head on one side, was regarding this human being with a most cheeky air. His sole audience gave no reply and manifested slight interest in his concerns by flying home to Mrs. Sparrow and family.

"It's a bit soon," added Gerald. "Besides, I'm in my cycling togs. But that would certainly be more in keeping with my cycling tour. But, still, I think I'll wait a bit!"

He rode on several miles further until just where the road crosses the Lynn and rises over Wodley Hill he dismounted. The road stretched away downhill for some long distance, eventually turning sharply at the edge of a deep pool, called Wodley Pool, which was locally reputed to be bottomless.

The scene before him, as he meditatively gazed over his pipe, was most beautiful. A rolling stretch of low, wooded hill with pasture land in the valleys. Occasional streams wandered, seemingly at their will. Here and there tiny hamlets lay snug in a wooded fold, whilst around the edge of the picture lay the seeming infinity of the ocean.

Then Gerald turned to look above him; for he had paused, as I said, in the centre of this long hill. Suddenly a cyclist appeared over the brow and commenced to rapidly descend. Then, as he looked, Gerald saw the arms of the cyclist give a sudden jerk downwards, and then he saw the rider held the handlebars apart from the machine.

"Good Heavens!" he cried. "It's a girl, and she's smashed her handlebars, and—— Good Heavens! It's Ethel!"

For now the machine, with its helpless rider sitting in the saddle with nothing to steer with or hold by, had flashed past him. The consciousness of her great danger was written on her face, which was still and white as marble. The machine was running steadily with the free wheel in action, the rider holding in her hands the broken handlebar with the useless brake hanging limply thereto.

As she flew past Gerald, he jumped at his machine and in a second was tearing madly down the hill after her. Still her machine ran steadily, but he knew that she would never get round the corner by Wodley Pool. The front wheel of her bicycle, too, might hit a stone, which would mean that the machine would turn and throw its rider. And at the pace at which she was travelling that would have almost the gravest of consequences.

On, on, he tore, but his quarry had had a good start of him. On, on, he pedalled, as he had never pedalled in his life before, and every minute that fearful corner grew closer and closer. And now he was so near that the whirl of the wheels of her machine was quite apparent. Then he cried out to her:

"Keep calm, Ethel; I'm here—Gerald Sinclair!"

Then he put every ounce into his work and closed right up, nerving himself for the final effort. The corner by Wodley Pool was now only about two hundred yards off, and it must be now or never!

He was tearing along beside her, but he dared neither look nor speak, the tension was too great. With a hasty glance at the speeding landscape on the right of him, for Wodley Pool was on the left, and with a silent prayer, he suddenly threw his left arm round the waist of Ethel Walrond, and with a vicious tug, turned his flying bicycle into the hedge.

As he turned he took his remaining hand from the bars and held Ethel from him with both arms, whilst, with a tearing, sickening crash, he was thrown violently into the hedge.

And then it seemed he fell down—down, all the time holding Ethel out of danger. On and on he seemed to fall until he lay so peacefully, as it were, in the deep blue sea which always seemed to be below him as he was falling. Then he remembered nothing more until he opened his eyes and they encountered those of Ethel Walrond.

His wandering gaze wandered round the room wherein he lay. He didn't know it at all, and what was Ethel doing? Why did his arm hurt so?

"Oh, thank Heaven!" murmured Ethel, as she saw his eyes open. But when she saw the wondering, vacant gaze, she bent over him, crying:

"It is I, Ethel Walrond. Don't you know me, Mr. Sinclair?"

"Yes, I know you, Ethel," came the feeble response. A blush dyed her face as he used her Christian name, which became more and more pronounced as the sufferer, with his glance running vacantly around the room, muttered: "Ethel dear, my Ethel!" Then he relapsed into unconsciousness again.

It appeared that in falling he had broken his right arm and sustained a slight concussion of the brain. But, beyond the shock, Ethel had received no injury whatever. Her bicycle had jumped the fence of Wodley Pool and lay secure in the mud at the bottom thereof, where it is doubtless lying this very day. Gerald had been picked up and carried into a neighbouring house, where the inhabitants had, like good Samaritans, taken him in and cared for him.

A doctor had soon arrived from Minchead, and in a couple of days, with the exception of his broken arm, Gerald was high on the road to perfect health.

Ethel had constituted herself as his nurse, and Gerald told himself he would willingly have broken both arms and legs to have secured such attendance. How sweetly she had thanked him too, and he was ready to swear that he had felt her hand moving back the hair from his forehead when he was supposed to have been unconscious.

She was at his bedside now with that confounded medicine the physician had sent him. He gulped it down and returned the glass. As Ethel went to take it their hands met, the glass fell from Gerald's grasp on to the bed, and he held her hand a safe prisoner.

"Ethel," he whispered, "don't go away from me."

Shyly she gazed at him, and then, kneeling down by the bedside so that his left arm incircled her, she softly said:

"I don't want to, Gerald." Then, tenderly, so as not to disturb the broken arm, she placed her arms around his neck and kissed him on the lips, whilst he, hardly knowing whether he was awake or dreaming, strained her to him as well as he was able with his one sound arm.

"Now I can thank you properly for my life!" she whispered. And she did.

And that is how Ethel Walrond became Mrs. Gerald Sinclair. And that is why she gave up her work in connection with "Women's Rights," although they always bless the cause because that was the first thing that brought them together.

The fourth list of letters in the Juggled Letters Competition is published on page 807. Back numbers containing the lists that have already appeared can be had through any newsagent or direct from this office.

On page 823 you will find a story called "A Matter of Course." This is the eighth of the series of Love Problems which appear from time to time. The problem dealt with this week is "Should a Husband be a Complacent Person?" I shall be glad to have my readers' views on the subject, as to whether they agree with the story or not. If any readers care to send suggestions for Love Problems suitable for working up into stories, I shall be pleased to pay five shillings for each idea used. Mark your envelope "Love Problem."

Next week's cover will consist of a reproduction of the "Clan Macfie" Tartan. This makes the tenth tartan which has appeared in this way. Scottish readers should ask their newsagents to be sure to save them a copy of next week's issue.

This week sees the finish of the tales told in the Brighton express—the last one, "Mrs. Lyndsey's Daughter," is on page 826. From the many letters I have received I am glad to hear that they have been much appreciated by readers. A new series will be coming along shortly, full particulars of which will be announced in due course.

On the last page of Pearson's Weekly this week it will be seen that a number of kind friends have sent money enough to the Fresh Air Fund to defray the expenses of a whole party of children. The day on which these children go into the country will be called by the donor's name. If you send along £8 2s. or more, your name will be given to a day.

It is not necessary that the money should come out of your own pocket entirely. You can collect it or raise it by some other means—holding a bazaar or jumble sale, or something of that sort. If you cannot afford to send, or are not able to raise so much as £8 2s., smaller amounts will be very acceptable. It is impossible to have too much money. The number of children wanting a day in the country is always increasing, and at present the Fund is only able to touch the large towns.

Many smaller towns contain large numbers of children who are equally in want of a breath of country air, but they have to be left out owing to lack of means. Every little helps to swell the total, so do not mind sending a few pence even. Ninepence pays for one child. It is so easy to get a few stamps or postal order and inclose them in an envelope addressed to the Hon. Sec., Fresh Air Fund, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. Won't you go out to the post-office now? All amounts will be acknowledged in Pearson's Weekly. Collecting forms can be had on application.

THE BOND BETWEEN.

A Romance of Real Life. By BLANCHE EARDLEY.

The First Chapters.

LADY MAITLAND is the young second wife of Sir Trevor Maitland of Maitland Manor, Melton. She captivates everyone by her extreme beauty. Sir Trevor has three children—Jack, Agnes, and Muriel—by his first wife, and an only son, Woolf, by the present Lady Maitland.

Shortly after Sir Trevor's second marriage a baby-girl is found in the Manor grounds. She is intrusted to the care of Mrs. Parkins, the lodgekeeper's wife. The name of Ivy Strange is given to the child, and at the time of our story Jack Maitland is in love with her.

Heriot North, an old friend of the family, who visits the Manor to pay his addresses to Agnes, succumbs to the charms of Sir Trevor's young wife, to the great chagrin of Agnes, who is accordingly neglected. There is nothing Lady Maitland will not do for her boy Woolf. One evening when she goes to her room to dress for dinner she finds there an ex-convict and burglar—Mike Holland—who says that he was in gaol with her first husband, and unless she pays him well to keep silence he will blazon to the world the fact that she is a bigamist.

Lady Maitland protests that her first husband is dead, but to preserve the good name of her boy she consents to pay the price, and intrusts Heriot North with the first payment, twenty pounds, which is to be left at a certain place in London for Holland to call for.

Ivy Strange refuses to become engaged to Jack until the mystery of her birth is cleared up. This her lover promises to do, and to start with interviews Mrs. Parkins. The only information he gleans from her is that on Ivy's brow—hidden under her curls—when she was a baby there was a mark like the mark of a broad arrow! Jack goes to London to consult a detective, Gilbert Chase. Afterwards at his club he meets Digby Scarlett, a celebrated explorer. Scarlett accepts Jack's invitation to accompany him to Maitland Manor.

Lady Maitland recognises Scarlett as a man she had known during her first husband's lifetime, and she perceives that she is recognised, but for Woolf's sake she determines to stand her ground. During his stay at the Manor, Scarlett saves Ivy Strange from being ill-treated by Mike Holland.

Heriot North leaves his house, "The Hollies," to call at the Manor after dinner, and while passing through the wood hears the voices of a man and woman; the latter he thinks he recognises as belonging to Lady Maitland, but when he mentions the incident to her she says that it must have been Ivy—their voices are similar.

One evening, after Scarlett's return to town, he is told on arriving at his chambers that a man is waiting to see him. Something warns him of possible danger, and he slips a revolver into his pocket, then he goes to the door of his sitting-room and, softly turning the handle, walks in. As he does so a figure rises from a chair and comes forward slowly.

Digby Scarlett's fingers touch lightly the trigger of the revolver in his pocket.

FIFTEENTH CHAPTER.

"Hast Thou Found Me, oh! Mine Enemy?"

"Who are you?" Digby Scarlett said sharply, standing near the door, still keeping his hand in his pocket, and eyeing the silent figure with startled eyes.

"Who am I?" replied the man, with a hollow laugh, and choosing his words painfully, as though speech were strange to him. "You ask me that! You, upon whose mind my name should be written in letters of blood! You, whose black villainy robbed me of my manhood—my ambition—my wife! You ask my name, Digby Scarlett—you, the murderer of my life!"

Digby Scarlett recoiled before the burning passion of his unbidden guest's words, and his eyes fell under the savage invective of the shabby, white-haired man who had flung so strange a challenge in his teeth. He put his disengaged hand to his lip, and stroked his moustache—the old habit returning, while on his brow a few drops of moisture stood.

"I am still at a loss to recollect your name," he said slowly. "Of course your—your strange language I can only attribute to—one cause!"

A dark flush stained the pallid, wrinkled face of the man, and a wild gleam flashed into his sunken eyes.

"Ah! so you want to persuade yourself that I am drunk, do you?" he panted. "Have you not done with perjury yet, Digby Scarlett? Do the old tricks still cling to you after all these years?"

Digby Scarlett glanced at him keenly. The threadbare coat hung on his spare frame like a rag on a peg, the unshaven chin revealed a not too recent visit to the barber's, while his whole appearance was similar to that of a strong young tree struck suddenly into premature old age by a lightning flash.

The keen eyes of Digby Scarlett noticed all—the poverty, the broken physique, and the empty, quivering hands, rough and discoloured-looking, as though the owner of them had done much manual labour. He smiled, and withdrew from his pocket his own well-shaped hand with its delicately manicured nails. There was no need for such precaution; one blow from his strong arm would be all the defence he would need should the man before him attempt to wipe out any debts—supposed, or otherwise!

"So," he said slowly, "you are the convict chap, are you? What do you want with me? I can't afford to give you money!"

"Do you think I have sought for you all these years that I have been free," the man panted hoarsely, "for the pleasure of begging from you? No, Digby Scarlett, you and I have a long-standing score to settle, and I mean there to be no balance to carry over! I saw you by a happy chance, leaving the hotel yesterday. I knew you, in spite of your moustache; for the years could add much, but they left your eyes the same!" He paused to wipe his brow with a shaking hand, and on the other he supported himself against the back of a chair.

Digby Scarlett shrugged his shoulders. It was obvious that he had a madman to deal with; he would let him rave, then kick him out!

"Why," said the man, speaking with clear emphasis—"why did you go to the house yesterday, where the blow first fell, after you had done your diabolical work? What took you there?"

Digby Scarlett started, and for an instant his eyes flickered with a strange light. Then he laughed shortly:

"When I know for what purpose you have come here, I may consider any question you ask me."

"I have come," said the man, in a low, intense voice, "to get from you a confession of the infamy you perpetrated on me, so that I may go into the world—a beggar, perhaps, but with my name cleared from dishonour."

"Very pleasant—from your point of view!" sneered Digby Scarlett, "but where do I come in?"

"I vowed," continued the voice, unheeding the interruption, "to wrest that confession from you; to force it from your false throat with my fingers if need be!"

He took a step towards the man he had waited so long to meet, and half raised his hands as though to put his words into practice, and Digby Scarlett's fingers once again sought the derringer in his pocket, this time to bring it out and show it to the man, whose breath was rising to his lips in deep-drawn gasps.

"You see," he said coolly, "I am armed, and I warn you that any attempt to touch me will only end in throwing you into the place you have so recently left! With your reputation so well known to the police, I fancy you would not get the success you expect!

"It would be a difficult thing to set about," he sneered. "An ex-ticket-of-leave man blackmailing and threatening the man whose name he forged in the first place! I should advise you to think better of your great idea, or else spend a few thousands in procuring legal assistance in establishing your good name."

"You fiend!" burst from the lips of the baffled man. "You still have the devil on your side! I see now to strike you as I first intended would only be playing into your hands. As for the legal assistance!" he laughed bitterly, "you did well to suggest it to me, since I stand such a pitiful beggar before you! But don't think I shall forget!" he went on passionately. "The day will come yet; for God can't hide His face for ever from me, and then, Digby Scarlett, in the hour of my triumph, you will cry in vain for mercy! I will follow you, even if I do it on foot; dog your footsteps, and wait, as I have waited eighteen years! For all the shame I have endured you shall pay!"

He stopped and drew the back of his hand across his brow; it was pouring with the sweat of his soul's agony.

"I am going now," he said dully. "I am looking for someone else—my wife—Margaret!"

"Ah! I fancy I can tell you something about her," Digby Scarlett replied carelessly, placing the derringer on the table by his side and lighting a cigar.

"You!" breathed the man hoarsely. "You—know! Don't tell me that—that——" He stopped, and a red gleam shot from his eyes.

"Don't be alarmed!" sneered the other. "I saw her last when you did. I left England the day after. I read in a Continental paper sometime later that——"

"What?" gasped the man with livid lips. "For the love of Heaven have some mercy! Tell me, quickly!"

"That she—your wife, was—dead!"

"Dead!" he murmured. "Dead! Little Margaret—dead! I wanted to see her—to tell her that I was innocent!" Suddenly he caught his breath. "You are not lying, are you? Can I trust you now, after all your infamy?"

Digby Scarlett smiled: "You can, for it does not concern me now, whether she lived or died. That's why," he said quickly. "I called at the house to which you followed me yesterday. I learnt that her—baby—had died with her!"

He turned his back to throw some coal on the fire, and the stifled cry that came from the lips of the man sent a gleam into his eyes.

"Her baby!" murmured the broken-down wreck of manhood. "Oh, my God! I can't stand this! It is the last drop in my cup of bitterness!"

His hollow, panic-stricken eyes fell on the stooping figure of the man who had laid his life waste with such devastation, and robbed him of honour, wife, and child; and as he gazed there came into his mind the thought that makes murderers of men.

He looked round the room, and his eyes lighted on the derringer his enemy had left on the table.

Swiftly he leant forward and his fingers closed on it firmly; then he laughed, a low, gurgling laugh that sent the heart of Digby Scarlett into his mouth. It was the laugh of a man who had won an advantage.

He wheeled round quickly to meet the exultant, mocking eyes of the ex-ticket-of-leave-man, with death written in their depths; and his lips twitched under his dark moustache as the glittering light fell on the thing in the hand of the man he had wronged. It was his only weapon.

"So the tables are turned, Scarlett! You are in my power now! It is I who will make terms, and you who will obey them!" said the man grimly.

Digby Scarlett put out his hand to steady himself; as he did so he touched an electric button on the wall, still keeping his eyes on his enemy.

"Well," he said, after a pause, "what do you want me to do? You certainly have the game in your hands at present!" and an ugly smile crossed his mouth.

"Sit down and write your confession that will clear me from the charge of forgery!" replied the man loudly. "Although I have lost my wife and child, I will not rest until I have avenged their deaths, and let the world know that the man who was husband and father, was no felon!"

Digby Scarlett drew a chair forward, and sat down at the table, under the barrel of the derringer that was pointing straight at him. Death had been nearer to him in the wilds of Central Africa, but he had never feared it so much as now.

"And if I refuse?" he said, looking past the man at the door. "What then?"

"Unless your confession is in my hands in three minutes," said the other calmly, "I shall shoot you, then—myself! I don't want to live now; but I shall see that you don't live after me! Now write! I will time you!"

Scarlett took up a pen and examined the point. His eyelids were twitching and his teeth chattered as with sudden fever; a terrible wonder seizing him as to the strength of the button on the wall! In that had lain his one deliverance!

Suppose——!

A cold sweat broke out all over him.

"One—two!" said the monotonous voice of the man who waited to kill him; and with another furtive glance at the door, Digby Scarlett dipped the pen in the ink.

Suddenly the handle of the door turned, and instantaneously both men started. The next moment a servant entered the room, and looked from one to the other.

"Yes, sir?" he said, turning to Digby Scarlett, who once more resumed his haughty pose, while the other man shivered, put the revolver on the table, and grew again the outcast and degraded felon.

"Yes, I rang for you to show this—gentleman out," said Digby Scarlett. Then, turning to his visitor, he said smilingly:

"Good-night! Perhaps this will be of some use to you," and he held out a piece of gold.

The man took it silently; then dropped it on the floor, and ground it with his heel.

"Beggar as I am," he cried passionately, "I refuse blood-money!"

Then, turning to the door, he followed the wondering servant downstairs and went out into the night.

Digby Scarlett flung himself into a chair and wiped his brow.

"Phew! I almost imagined that my luck had turned! The felon nearly got his own back!"

He rose, and staggered across to the sideboard where a decanter stood, and poured out a glass of neat brandy. He raised it to his lips with a laugh.

"Here's to the 'dead Margaret' and—and," his laugh died away, "to my future wife, 'Ivy Strange'!"

It was dark on the bridge, and the man looking over into the dull, glittering water, shivered, and drew back.

"Not to-night!" he murmured. "Somehow I lack now the spirit to take my own miserable life, when a few moments ago I would gladly have taken two!"

He walked on, then stopped, and raised his face to the stars that sparkled in the sky.

"I wonder which of you is the 'little one'!" he said sadly. "Perhaps she who spurned me is with you—her larger light guiding your lesser one! I cannot die with the eyes of my loved ones looking on!"

He hurried away, and, after a time, reached a poor street in the East End, in one of the houses of which he rented a room. He entered it wearily, and turned to go supperless to bed, when a voice stopped him.

"'Ere's a letter come for you, Mr. Grant!"

He took it silently. He sometimes heard from editors regarding some wretched contribution he had sent them, and which more often than not, came back doomed by the poor address.

"Another refusal!" he said bitterly. "Ah, well! There is one post left to me which I shall fill soon!"

He opened the letter; then, after a moment's bewilderment, read the curt inclosure:

Messrs. Black and Stackpool, having given your MS. entitled 'The Pariah,' due consideration, have agreed to accept it on their usual terms, pending your approval. Kindly call here 10.30 to-morrow."

"Accepted! Accepted!" he murmured, a great, dry sob quivering in his throat, and filling his eyes with mists. "It means money—money; and money spells revenge!"

He dropped the letter on the wooden table, and flung his arms out in a passion of grief.

"And I have no one to share it! No one to rejoice in it! In my joy I shall live alone, as in my sorrow!"

He sank into a chair and buried his head in his hands, and the cry that his joy wrung from him was:

"Too late! Too late! Too late!"

SIXTEENTH CHAPTER.

Gilbert Chase Takes Notes.

The bar parlour of the "New Age" Inn was always full, on market days especially, for through the villages of Chorlton and Melton many farmers passed on their way to Leicester, and on a cold, wet night the warm, cosy inn was an alluring temptation to all sorts and conditions of men.

The landlord, David Snaffle, was superintending his one barmaid, and serving in the bar himself, exchanging racing tips with one or two chosen companions. The entrance of a quiet-looking man with mild blue eyes and an unobtrusive manner was not noticed, and the stranger, after a casual glance round the bar, ordered a plate of cold beef and a whisky-and-soda.

"Can you let me have a room here for a night or two?" he said, when the barmaid attended to his wants.

"I don't know, sir," she said. "I'll ask Mr. Snaffle."

The landlord was asked, and came forward eagerly. "Well, sir, we have one room vacant we shall be pleased to let you 'ave. It's plain and homely, but clean."

The quiet-looking man smiled. "That will do amply. My wants are small, and I will take my meals down here, I like to see cheerful faces round me. By the way," he went on, buttering a piece of bread, "do you often have strangers down in these parts?"

"On and off, sir," replied the landlord; "mostly tramps, and such like on their way to other towns."

"Ah!" and the blue eyes flickered with a sudden interest. "Is this village Chorlton or Melton? I am afraid I am a bit shaky in my geography."

"This is Melton, sir. Chorlton is five miles yonder; and I'm glad it is Melton, too!"

"How's that?" queried the stranger.

"Because, sir," replied the man, "there's not many places of this sort blessed with such a squire and lady as Sir Trevor Maitland and 'is wife."

"Humph! A kindly old couple, I suppose?"

David Snaffle laughed. "Well, sir, the Squire is getting on certainly; but 'is lady is 'is second wife, and no lovelier lady 'as ever been seen in these parts before, and as good as she is beautiful, too; and as for age, she is not more 'an a few years older than Mr. Jack, the Squire's heir, who sometimes drops in 'ere quite pleasant like. I've seen him grow up from a boy."

Just then the loquacious landlord was called away, and the stranger leisurely finished his supper. As he raised his glass to his lips the swing doors opened, and a man stood on the threshold, peering round with furtive eyes.

Suddenly he saw the smooth face and fair hair of the stranger as he was busy pouring his refreshing liquid down his throat, and, with a muffled cry, the man drew back quickly, but not before the pale blue eyes of the man with the glass had flashed into his own.

Outside he paused, and drew his hand across his ugly mouth.

"Wot's 'e doin' dahn 'ere?" he muttered. "Is 'e takin' up the burglaries, or," and his eyes grew scared, "is she playin' a game of bluff? I'll hurry it on, it's wiser to take a lump sum down and clear out afore questions are asked, than stay and 'ave things quered by Gilbert Chase!"

The next morning the stranger left the "New Age," and went for a stroll into the village. In the post-office he scribbled a short note, and calling a boy, told him to take it to Maitland Manor at once and give it into the hands of Mr. Jack Maitland.

The boy went off, and Gilbert Chase stood outside the post-office looking in the direction of the Manor with thoughtful eyes.

"I wonder what that old 'lag' was doing with his head inside the village pub of Melton?" he murmured. "I will make it my business to find out, just for professional curiosity's sake. But at present I am on more important business than looking after a beggar like that. Time enough when I hear he's wanted!"

As he lingered on the post-office steps, a smart dog-cart came rattling up and stopped right in front of him. In it were four people—a man and woman in front, a girl and a boy at the back. But the blue eyes of the ordinary-looking man on the steps dwelt in amazement upon the face of the woman holding the reins.

The boy dismounted and ran into the post-office, presently coming out with some stamps in his hand. "Here they are, mummie!" he cried. "I got them all in halfpenny stamps! They are such a pretty colour!"

The woman laughed—a laugh that made her look even younger. "Oh, Woolf! You will never do to go shopping for me! Imagine if I sent you to buy me some dresses!"

As they drove off Gilbert Chase looked after them with a puzzled frown, then, stepping back into the post-office, he asked for some stamps. As the woman served him he said carelessly: "What a pretty little chap that was that came in just now!"

"Yes," said the woman; "Sir Trevor is real proud of 'im, being 'is youngest son."

"Ah!" he said, folding his stamps and putting them into his pocket, "So the lady driving was Lady Maitland?"

Digitized by Google

"She was," replied the woman; "and looks as young as she did when she came to Melton fifteen years ago!"

"Ah!" he said again; "she is certainly very beautiful." Then, when he was once more outside, he said to himself:

"I don't know if I am going silly, but I could almost have sworn that I had seen that face before. And I used to pride myself on my memory! Any way, I had better pull up, if I'm going to include the face of Sir Trevor Maitland's wife among my museum of horrors!"

After an aimless walk, he strolled along the road he had traversed earlier, when a voice hailed him. He turned round quickly.

"Is that you, Mr. Chase? said Jack Maitland. "I just got your note as I was leaving the Manor for a ride. I am glad you have come up; I was going to write to you."

"Well, Mr. Maitland," said the detective slowly, "it was no use my either writing or sending for you, or coming to see you, unless I had something to say."

"Then, from your presence here," said Jack eagerly, "I conclude you have some important news for me?"

"Not important," replied Gilbert Chase slowly; "rather interesting, though it may lead to an important clue later."

"What is it, then?" said Jack impatiently; the cold, impassive face of the detective damping his good spirits.

"I have found the woman who remembers the mark on the child's brow!"

"Where is she?" said Jack quickly. "Does she know the parents then?"

The man smiled, almost pityingly: "I advertised in several papers," he began slowly, "offering a sum of money—as you said expense was no object—for information regarding a girl nurse-child with a broad arrow on its brow, deserted about fourteen years ago. A few days later I had a dirty-looking letter from an address in Brentford saying the writer, a woman, could supply the information desired, but was unable to leave her home on account of being a cripple. Well, I went down there and saw the woman."

He paused and drew a cigar-case from his pocket. "It's not my way to smoke during a business chat, but if you don't mind, I will do so now, Mr. Maitland, it will keep me warm this cold day."

"Won't you come up to the house?" said Jack politely. "Or I will go with you to the 'New Age,' if you like?"

Gilbert Chase shook his head. "I don't want it to leak out that I am a detective," he said. "Last night I professed ignorance of these parts. It would not do for you to be coming to the 'New Age' with me this morning. But if I could have a quiet chat with you at the Manor, where I can go and come without attracting attention, it would be more comfortable for both of us."

"That will be all right," Jack said briskly, he was burning to hear what he had so longed to find out—the mystery of his sweetheart's birth. "I will say you are a messenger come to see me on important business, should I be asked."

They soon reached the Manor, and as Jack was crossing the hall with his guest, Lady Maitland came out of the library and watched them thoughtfully as they disappeared into Jack's special "den."

In the drawing-room she saw Muriel talking to Woolf, and, on seeing his mother, the boy said—

"Mummie, I just saw Jack coming in with the man who was standing on the Post Office steps when we drove into the village this morning."

"Yes," laughed Muriel, "he reminded me somehow of one of those detectives you read about in novels, Mother o' Pearl; a quiet, sly face, always trying to conceal the fact that he has a face at all!"

Lady Maitland laughed, but she did not hear the girl's speech.

"A detective!" she wondered, and a shiver shook her slight frame. "What is a detective doing at Maitland Manor?" Then her face cleared, and the light came back into her eyes.

"Why, of course, that foolish boy talked of seeking out the mysterious secret of his 'Ivy's' birth! That creature may probably be engaged on tracing it to a gipsy's van!"

In the meantime that "creature" was continuing his conversation with Jack Maitland, ignorant of the chance shot at his profession by Muriel Maitland.

"As I was saying, I saw the woman, who told me that before she was married she took in nurse-children, and that nearly sixteen years ago, so far as she could remember, a little girl baby of about a year old was brought to her by an elderly woman, who said she was to find a good home for the child, as the mother had gone to Australia, and when she returned she would send for it. A year's money was paid down and the child left, the woman gave the name of Mrs. Brown, but omitted to mention that of the child.

"Then," continued the calm, even voice of the detective, "this person, while bathing the girl one night, noticed the mark under the hair on the right side of the temple. It was very small, but quite easy to make out. But as the child's hair grew thick and long, it was not noticed.

"Well, exactly a year after, the same woman Brown called for the child and took it away with her, saying it was going back to its mother. Since then she had forgotten the incident until she saw my advertisement in the paper."

"And is that all?" said Jack, in a disappointed voice. "Was there no name on the linen; was nothing left behind?"

The detective shook his head. "I asked all those questions," he said shortly, "the child had been given into her hands in ready-made clothes; it left in the same sort. The only new discovery I made was an old bib, marked with 'G' or 'C.' She was not sure which baby it belonged to. Now, the next person to be found is Mrs. Brown."

He rose and looked out of the window; then turned round suddenly.

"Is there any chance of my being able to see this young lady without her knowing it? I just want a glimpse of her, that's all, as I suppose you never found that photograph you lost?"

"No, never. But I can ask her to look out of the window in the library," Jack replied. "She is in the house, I know, because she came up early to the Manor, then went with my young sister to do needlework or something."

"Very well," Gilbert Chase said. "I will walk round past your library window, as though mistaking my way, then turn back again, so I shall get two good looks at her."

Jack scribbled a few words on a piece of paper, then left the room. In the morning room he saw Muriel with his step-mother and Woolf.

"I want you, Kitten," he said. "I sha'n't keep you long."

The girl rose and followed him. "Do you know where Ivy is?" he murmured. "I want you to take this note to her."

"She was going to Mother o' Pearl's boudoir to copy some letters for her, some time ago," his sister replied. She was the only member of the family who approved of Jack loving the beautiful foundling.

"Then, Kitten, dear," Jack said smilingly. "I want you to take her this note at once."

"May I read it?" she laughed.

"Yes, there's nothing in it," he answered, "only a request. Go at once, dear,"

He left her and returned to his guest, while Muriel slowly wended her way to her step-mother's boudoir.

Suddenly she stopped, and a roguish smile lit up her face. "He said I might read it, so why not? I will just see what kind of a request it is."

She undid the folded piece of paper and read—

"DEAREST,—Will you stand in the library window for a few seconds until you see me pass? I won't be long, and my reason for asking you is very important."

"What a ridiculous request!" laughed the girl. "I've a good mind—! Yes, I will! He will be wild with me, though!"

Hastily returning, she sought the library, and went to the window that looked on to the path that wound round the house, and stood gazing out with an expectant look on her face.

At that moment Gilbert Chase parted from Jack. "I will go first," he said. "It will seem odd if I stand with you staring at her, then, after I have returned, you just walk briskly to the window and back again."

"Oh, bother!" said Muriel, with a yawn. "There's only that silly friend of Jack's gone by, probably mistaken his way, and now he actually has the insolence to stare at me too!" she exclaimed, as she met the intent gaze of her brother's visitor. He stood still for a moment, then, casting a puzzled glance round, retraced his steps and disappeared.

"I sha'n't wait," Muriel said. "I will give this note to Ivy now, and let her do his command. It is too slow for me!"

As she went out she met Ivy Strange at the door, looking pale and fragile.

"Ivy, Jack has sent you this note," she said quickly. "I know its contents," she added, laughing, seeing the girl blush. "And you are to stand in the window till he passes."

Ivy Strange stole up to the window in time to see her lover's face light up with a tender caress as he caught sight of her, and her tired violet eyes shone with a loving smile as she waved her white hand to him.

"Ah!" she murmured sadly. "If you only guessed, my darling, that I knew all concerning that fearful debt about which that horrible man is worrying Lady Maitland! But you never will, for I am trying to help her—and you—by taking him money from her!"

A short time afterwards, Gilbert Chase was sitting in the room he had engaged at the "New Age" Inn, before him was a substantial meal, and by the side of his plate there lay an open notebook, into which he occasionally glanced.

"Humph! Brown eyes and hair, rather cheeky-looking, but pretty! Nothing remarkable, though. I had an idea that she was fair, with unusual good looks. Anyway, there's nothing to keep me in Melton now, unless"—and he laughed softly—"unless I pay a visit to my friend, Mike. It shows a forgiving spirit to look up old pals!"

And no prophetic instinct warned the detective in what capacity he would pay his visit to the ex-convict.

SEVENTEENTH CHAPTER.

"I am your Father!"

THE new owner of the "Rest" had returned to Melton, and taken possession of his bachelor residence with a feeling of keen pleasure. Although the place was for the habitation of a single man, yet, strangely enough, it had been furnished for the reception of a mistress, and whispers were rife as to the unknown chatelaine Digby Scarlett was thinking upon.

The master of the "Rest" was occupied with thoughts very near the subject on the morning that he strolled across to pay a visit to his new friends, Sir Trevor and Lady Maitland, just ten days after his experience with the man who had so nearly extinguished his life.

A grim smile crossed his face as the memory of that evening came back to him, and as he inquired for the mistress of Maitland Manor the smile lingered in his eyes, and even his voice was more than usually caressing as he said to the servant:

"Tell Lady Maitland I would be most grateful if she could see me for a few moments; I have some news for her."

Lady Maitland was in her boudoir when the message was brought to her, and she knew that in the last words of it lay a challenge she dare not ignore. The gauntlet had been flung at her feet, and she must either pick it up or——! Her eyes fell on a certain photograph in a silver frame, and she made her choice.

When Digby Scarlett a few minutes later was shown into the boudoir he was received by a brilliantly beautiful woman with sparkling eyes and dimples lurking in the soft curves of cheek and chin.

"So you have returned to Melton for good, Mr. Scarlett?" she said gaily, her white fingers playing with the leaves of a crimson rose.

"Yes, Lady Maitland," he replied slowly, "I have returned; but whether for good or not time will show!"

"Time!" she laughed. "Surely time has nothing to do with our virtues and vices?"

Digby Scarlett smiled grimly. This woman, whose secret was no secret to him, wrung from him a reluctant admiration. He had been right when he had said she would show fight.

"Perhaps that may be so, Lady Maitland," he answered slowly; "but I fancy time has a very great deal to do with our—vengeance!"

She turned slightly from him, and gazed into the log fire with eyes that looked beyond the flames.

"You had some news for me, Mr. Scarlett?" she said, after a pause. "Will you not tell me what it is? My time is limited, and I must not waste it in discussing theories."

"And I do not come to discuss theories!" he retorted, with a scarcely veiled sneer; "unless you consider the existence of a man you thought—or hoped—dead, and whom I saw in London, a theory, Lady Maitland? Personally, I think it rather an awkward fact!"

The delicate pink in her ladyship's cheeks faded just a little, and the scarlet of her lips seemed to have given place to a pale, bloodless hue; but she raised her eyes to her inquisitor with a defiant courage and laughed softly.

"Come, Mr. Scarlett," she said, "why should you and I play with words? We have no time to fence with pretty speeches! After all, I wonder which of us a judge and jury would think the worst of," she went on passionately. "Myself—the half-frenzied girl, who madly sought to bury an ignominious marriage in oblivion; or you—the deliberate liar and perjurer, who sent an innocent man to a living death!"

"Ah!" she cried, in a low, hoarse whisper, "that went home, did it, Digby Scarlett? You thought I knew nothing of your diabolical plot to ruin the man you hated? But I had not the courage to speak then. I was only a weak girl, terrified by the whole affair, and eager to get away from it. Now you are here—what is the price of your silence?"

She lay back in her chair, and the lace on her bosom rose and fell quickly with each breath, but the smile on her lips lingered, as though trained to play the part she had forced upon them.

"Well?" she repeated; "your price, Mr. Scarlett! Name it! Don't hesitate! Men like you have always a price!"

The bitter taunt in her words stung him to a retort. The knowledge that she had known of his treachery had been an unexpected slap in the face; it had taken the wind out of the sails of his confidence. Suppose she struck back! But his eyes followed those of the woman in the chair, and he smiled—the boy would hold her tongue!

"My price, Lady Maitland," he said, with elaborate politeness, "is very light, in consideration of what it might have been. I wish you to help me in something I have set my heart upon—that is all. The other affair I regard as nothing as compared with what I have to gain by your co-operation."

"Your heart!" she murmured, with a bitter smile; "since when have you acquired such an encumbrance, Mr. Scarlett; and in what way is it within my power to aid you?"

A slow smile came to the man's lips, and a curious light flickered in his eyes, as he replied—

"I wish—nay, I command you—as the price of my silence regarding your bigamous marriage with Sir Trevor Maitland, to help me to gain for my wife the one creature in all the world I would marry—the girl at the lodge, with whom your step-son imagines himself in love—the waif, Ivy Strange!"

Lady Maitland drew a deep breath with astonishment. She had expected anything but this! It was so simple that at first she hardly knew whether to regard it seriously or not. But one look at the calm, set face of the man who had plainly given her his price for silence, told her that he was a man incapable of joking, and what he wanted he meant to get.

"The waif, Ivy Strange!" she repeated. "Can you know what you are saying, Mr. Scarlett? A girl with no birth—only a pretty face!"

He smiled grimly. "I am perfectly cognisant of all that, Lady Maitland; and I wish you to help me win her—to use your influence with the girl to look upon me as a favourable lover!"

"There is—Jack!" she said curiously. "Am I to persuade him to give her up?"

He snapped his fingers scornfully. "Leave him to me. I wish you to deal with the girl."

She closed her eyes, and for a moment looked swiftly at the bearing this new departure would have upon her own immediate affairs. Suddenly she smiled, and rose from her chair with a languid grace.

"I think you may leave that to me, Mr. Scarlett. It will not be my fault if I fail in bringing the girl to a reasonable frame of mind——"

"Fail!" he said quickly. "That is what you must not do! I expect success from you; or——" Their eyes met in a swift challenge.

"Exactly, Mr. Scarlett," she murmured. "I shall not fail you."

As he walked across to the "Rest" Digby Scarlett laughed noiselessly. "She will help me. Then, when she knows! I shall indeed have my cup overflowing."

Lady Maitland also laughed when her visitor had left her. "That was a capital idea of mine!" she murmured. "For a larger sum of money that creature will swear anything; and with the girl's quixotic sense of honour she would rather die than let Jack marry her with a stain on her name. Yes, I shall buy this silence very cheaply!"

* * * * * *

It was the half hour before dinner, and Ivy Strange was in Lady Maitland's boudoir listening with a white, frightened face to something her ladyship was saying to her in a low, sweet voice.

"You love Jack, you say, Ivy; then surely love prompts you to sacrifice?"

"Yes, it does, Lady Maitland," the girl answered in a pained voice, "but not to such a sacrifice as selling myself into a loveless marriage!"

"Loveless marriage!" said Lady Maitland, with a faint sneer; "surely a girl in your ambiguous position ought to feel honoured that she should be deemed worthy the notice of such a man as Digby Scarlett."

"Perhaps you are right," the girl murmured, flushing hotly; "but I can only repeat that I can never under any possibilities marry Mr. Scarlett. I fear him! He is a bad man; I feel sure of it; something tells me so."

"And yet," continued the low, even voice, "he saved you from possible harm some time ago at the hand of a—beggar."

"Yes, yes," Ivy cried eagerly, "and I was grateful to him for that; that man frightened me. But since then Mr. Scarlett has persecuted me, and made me regret having accepted a kindness from him."

She spoke passionately, and her usually shy manner had departed, giving way to a new, proud bearing that puzzled Lady Maitland.

"Take my advice," she said coldly, "and try to like the man who has set his heart upon you. There is another reason," she went on quickly, "why you should make this sacrifice. You would not care to drag Jack down into his father's bad books, which would most certainly happen if he married you, for—I know the secret of your—birth!"

She had spoken slowly, watching the girl between half-closed eyes, noting each wave and ebb of colour in the pale face.

"You—know!" gasped the girl. "Then tell me—in pity's name—tell me the worst, Lady Maitland. What is it that can be so disgraceful as to separate me from my lover?"

Lady Maitland drew back coldly from the girl's feverish clutch.

"I think the best person to tell you of your parentage," she went on thoughtfully, "is the man you will have to regard with a daughter's love—a daughter's filial obedience. He will tell you all. But I warn you," she went on, "that what you will be told will raise a barrier between you and the heir of Maitland Manor, and you should be thankful that another man, equally good looking, rich and well born, still waits to win you."

"My father! My father!" murmured the girl, clasping and unclasping her hands; "oh, Lady Maitland! tell me—how you knew this!"

"I promised to tell you nothing, Ivy. I have known a short time only. Now," she said, turning the conversation into another channel, "I wish you to take this envelope to—to the man you met before. Don't be afraid; he will not frighten you again!" she added hastily, seeing a look of terror cross the girl's face; "and also take this letter to him; tell him he is to read it, then destroy it immediately. Remember, he is to destroy it immediately," she reiterated impressively; "don't forget!"

The girl took the letters silently, and, bowing her head, left the room. She was consumed with a burning desire to hear the worst about herself, and even the fact that she was—as she fondly imagined — helping to stop the mouth of an importunate creditor of her lover, Jack, did not keep her mind from dwelling on the secret she must alone hear from her father's lips. But when! But where!

In the spinny all was dark and sinister, and a solitary figure, strolling to and fro, with stealthy steps, muttered an oath as the distant church clock struck ten.

Suddenly there was a slight rustle, as of a woman's gown turning over the twigs and dead leaves on the ground, and a slim, girlish shape approached the waiting man.

"Sent you agen, 'as she!" he muttered savagely. "She's fond of shielding 'erself behind others. Well," he whispered cautiously, "so it's you, young miss, is it? Oh, you needn't look skeered. I've too much to think of to take adwantage of yer sweetheart's knockin' me down! Wot 'ave yer got for me?"

The girl held out two letters silently.

"Two!" exclaimed the man, "wot's that for?"

"This one I was told to say was to be read now," she replied dully; "then you were to destroy it immediately before me."

The man looked at her, but could not decide whether she was playing a joke upon him or not.

"Read it!" he retorted with a coarse laugh. "That's not easy, young Miss, seein' as 'ow there's no bloomin' moon out, and they 'aven't thought of lightin' the spinny with electric light yet! But I'll strike a match, if you'll 'old me 'at for a minit and read this precious dockyment!"

With unwilling fingers the girl held the battered remnant of a hat, while the man opened the letter, then struck a match from a tin box he drew out of his pocket.

Slowly and with difficulty he went once, twice, thrice, over the few brief words under the flickering light of three matches. Then, with grave deliberation he tore the letter into several pieces, and, after satisfying himself as to the contents of the other envelope, he turned to the silent girl before him.

"Well, my girl," he said, with an ugly leer; "ain't yer goin' to say nuffin' to me afore yer go?"

She drew back coldly.

"Good-night," she said, then turned to go; but he caught her by the sleeve and laughed mockingly.

"Is that all—Ivy, my lass. After all these years, 'ave yer no kinder word for me than that! Me that's sought yer and only found yer when yer 'eart's turned agen me by yer 'igh and mighty friends!"

"What do you mean?" she said in a hoarse whisper. "Why do you speak to me like that? Who are you? Speak!"

The man lurched forward. "Come and kiss me, my girl," he whispered. "I'm the man that's been 'unting for yer all these years!"

"Your name!" she cried, recoiling; "your name, first!"

"My name?" he laughed. "It's Mike Holland—ex-convict and—yer lovin' father!"

A Correction.

HE: "I suppose you find a great many dull people here?" She: "On the contrary, it is the dull people who always find me."

The Landlord Had Been.

"YOU seem to be much put out," said the maiden. "I am indeed," replied the poet. "My landlord called for the rent this morning—and I hadn't got it."

Not the Only Way.

HE: "I do believe that some women go on the stage solely for the pleasure of taking a new name." She: "I—ah—there must be an easier way than that!"

Not Quite the Same.

"THEN you regard marriage as a civil contract?" asked the Sweet Young Thing. "No," answered the Savage Bachelor. "It's rather a contraction of civility."

Different Kinds of Choice.

"SHE says she has remained single from choice." "That's right. I wouldn't undertake to say whose choice it was, but the broad, general statement is unquestionably true."

A Tie, Anyhow.

"It's all foolishness to talk about anyone getting the worst of it in the matrimonial game," declared the big man with a silk hat. "How's that?" "Marriage is always a tie."

They were Society People!

"THAT elopement in high life was so romantic. They stole out——" "No, no, you mustn't say that; they belong to the best society. You should say, 'They kleptomaniacked.'"

Better Change the Line.

AMATEUR POET: "How's this line of my 'Ode to My Sweetheart'?—'Thy bright eyes outrival twin diamonds!'" His Sister: "Make it 'Thy rivals shall eye thy twin diamonds,' and she's yours for ever."

No Need to Worry.

NANETTE: "Ah, but beauty is only skin deep, after all. How do I know that the man I marry will not become cold when I begin to fade?" Gladys: "Oh, don't worry about that. The man who marries you will banish beauty from his consideration at the start."

Not Lasting Love.

"WHEN we were married," sobbed the young wife, "he said he loved me with a love more enduring than the everlasting granite!" "And it didn't last?" queried the sympathising friend. "Last!" echoed the young wife, drying her tears. "It didn't last as long as an asphalt pavement!"

Didn't Matter About Ancestors.

HE: "It is so good of you, darling, to accept me. But even my great wealth, I am afraid, can't make you forget that my grandfather was a common fisherman." She: "Why need I forget it? I will tell everybody about your ancestral hauls, and on your income we will be as happy as the day is long."

Indulgent to Whom?

"KATHARINE, you will always find me an indulgent husband." "Do you mean indulgent to me or indulgent to yourself?"

Idle versus Curious.

"MEN," said the Girl, "have as much idle curiosity as women." "More," said the Bachelor. "Women's curiosity is always active."

Unkind in the Extreme.

MISS DE VERE: "Ours is a very old family, Mr. Bloo." Mr. Bloo: "So I perceive. Have you no brothers or sisters younger than yourself?"

Her Assumed Name.

HE: "She is living under an assumed name." She: "Horrible! What is it?" He: "The one she assumed immediately after her husband married her."

Great Improvements.

"WHEN your wife was a young girl she used to paint still-life pictures prettily. Has she improved in her accomplishments since?" "Indeed she has! She can now cook all the things she used to paint."

In Another Country.

"I'M so happy," she said. "Ever since my engagement to Charlie the whole world seems different. I do not seem to be in dull, prosaic London, but in——" "Lapland," suggested the small brother.

How She Recognised Him.

IT was at a masquerade ball, and she recognised him at once. "How did you come to recognise me, darling? Was it the loud beating of my heart that gave me away?" "Oh, no," she replied, "it was your bow legs."

He Comforted Her.

"Do you know, Paul," said Ethel trembling, "I sometimes fear that you don't love me any more." "Right you are," said Paul, embracing her. "I couldn't." And Ethel heaved a sigh and settled down contentedly.

Children Not Wanted.

THE DEAR GIRL: "I am really astonished to hear you advance the proposition that a child should not be corrected in the presence of strangers." The Savage Bachelor: "He should not be, because he should never be in the presence of strangers; that's why."

He'd Learnt a Lesson.

"DON'T you think," said the pensive girl, "that people make mistakes by acting on generous impulses?" "Yes," answered the smooth-shaven man, "I acted on generous impulses for nearly two months once. Now, if I don't get paid on salary day I don't act."

The Infallible Cure.

A WOMAN cured her husband of staying out late at night by going to the door when he came home, and whispering through the keyhole, "Is that you, Willie?" Her husband's name is John, and he stays at home every night now, and sleeps with one eye open, and a revolver under his pillow.

Why Men are Distrustful.

"I WONDER why it is that so many men of talents become sour and distrustful of their fellow creatures?" mused the young woman. "I suppose," replied Miss Cayenne, "it's because they are constantly subjected to such emotional extremes. They can never tell whether a caller is an autograph-collector or a bill-collector."

Too Much Consideration for Her.

"YOU did not go to the chemist as I requested you?" Beryl Montague's voice rang out clear and cold. As for Mr. Montague, her husband, he drew himself up to his full height. "No!" he answered haughtily. "Have I not given my word that I never would do anything to bring the blush to your cheek? Telegraph for your complexion and tell the chemist to send it up!"

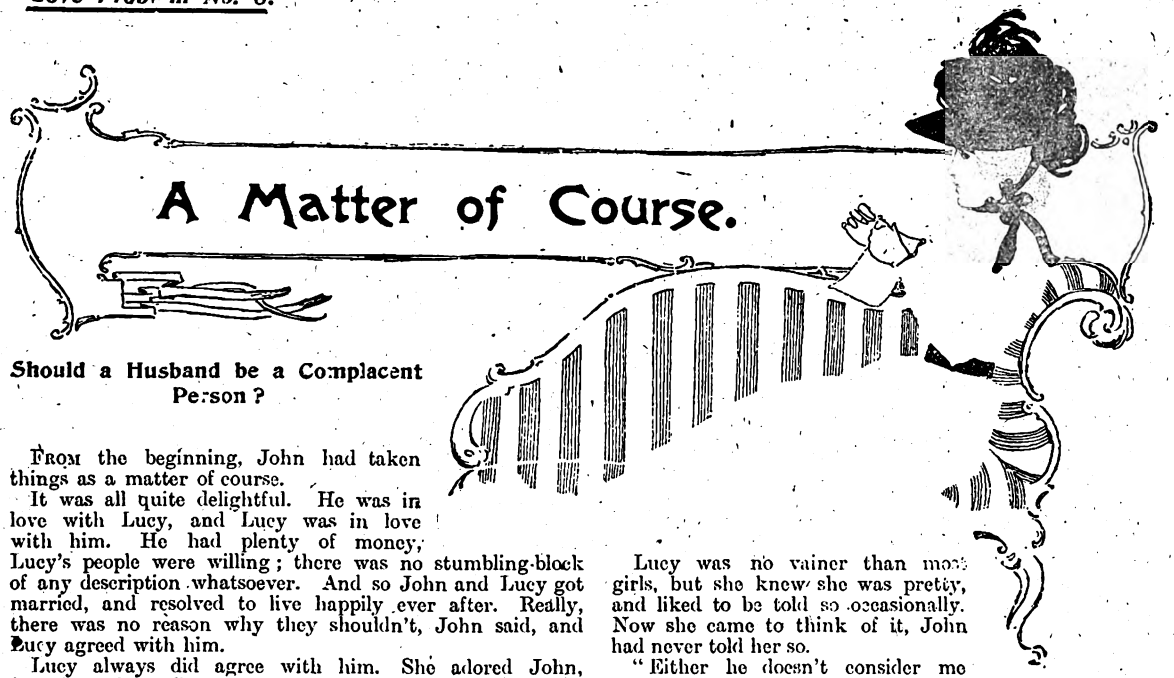
Love Problem No. 8.

A Matter of Course.



Should a Husband be a Complacent Person?

FROM the beginning, John had taken things as a matter of course.

It was all quite delightful. He was in love with Lucy, and Lucy was in love with him. He had plenty of money, Lucy's people were willing; there was no stumbling-block of any description whatsoever. And so John and Lucy got married, and resolved to live happily ever after. Really, there was no reason why they shouldn't, John said, and Lucy agreed with him.

Lucy always did agree with him. She adored John, frankly and unaffectedly—which was most unwise of her, of course. John was a nice man, but he was only a man. He took the gifts the gods sent him quite as a matter of course.

He was well-to-do, and his business in the City prospered, as a matter of course.

Lucy loved him, as a matter of course. She was always bright, and cheerful, and affectionate, as a matter of course. She obeyed him in everything, as a matter of course.

She dressed in the way that pleased him best, she read the books he selected for her, she sang the songs he chose, she saw the plays he approved of, she entertained his friends, and dropped certain friends of her own whom he had said he didn't care for—all quite as a matter of course.

It never occurred to John that a wife may have wishes and interests apart from her husband's; that there may be something in the nature of a sacrifice in her complete dependence upon her husband's will, something which called for more than mere acceptance as his rightful due.

To do John justice, he was by no means indifferent to Lucy's charming qualities. He had simply got used to them, just as he had got used to an excellent dinner. He enjoyed both, and accepted both as a matter of course.

At first Lucy was too wrapped up in the joy and dignity of her new position and in her admiration for John, to notice anything amiss. But, by degrees, she began to notice things.

For instance.

"I'm going to bring a friend home to dinner to-night, darling," remarked John one morning at breakfast.

"To-night!" exclaimed Lucy. "Why, don't you remember, dear, mother has a box for the Lyceum, and you arranged to take me?"

"By Jove, I'd forgotten all about it! What a nuisance! I can't put Desmond off."

"Then we must give up the Lyceum, I suppose."

"I'm afraid so. I'll wire to mother on my way to the office. I daresay she can take Max and Kitty."

"Not a word that he's sorry, or—or anything," reflected Lucy. And, for the first time since their marriage, she felt a little sorry for herself.

From that day, John's habit of taking things as a matter of course gradually began to dawn upon Lucy.

Lucy was no vainer than most girls, but she knew she was pretty, and liked to be told so occasionally. Now she came to think of it, John had never told her so.

"Either he doesn't consider me pretty, or else he takes it as a matter of course," said Lucy to herself. "In either case, it's rather hard."

She found it rather hard, too, that all her pretty frocks made apparently no impression upon John.

In the early days of their engagement, John had expressed certain arbitrary views on the subject of woman's dress, and ever since then, Lucy had taken infinite pains to please him, even to the sacrifice of certain pet weaknesses of her own. And to all this, John apparently was blind. He found no fault, but neither did he dole out a single word of praise.

Now, a pretty woman likes to be complimented upon her dress even more than upon her looks, and Lucy, being no exception to the rule, began to pine for some positive sign of John's approval.

Now she came to think of it, he had never even told her that he loved her—at least, not in so many words.

"Every woman wants to be told in so many words," said Lucy.

By this time, the vague sense of injustice under which she had been smarting, half-unconsciously at first, had taken definite shape. She felt she had a grievance against John—a good, substantial grievance.

"He takes everything for granted," said Lucy to herself. And then it suddenly occurred to her that she, too, was taking things for granted.

"How do I know he really loves me, since he's never said so?"

"How do I know he cares what I wear, or how I look, or whether I'm fond of him or not? How do I know he isn't indifferent, and not merely thoughtless?"

The wretched suspicion, once conceived, haunted Lucy day and night. She thought of it so persistently that doubt at last seemed to be certainty, and finally—well, finally John began to notice a change in Lucy's manner.

All her pretty, affectionate little ways disappeared one by one. Frigid politeness took their place.

John had got used to being petted and caressed by Lucy. He was wont to look upon these endearments with a sort of happy complacency that suggested no corresponding obligations on his part. When Lucy put her arms about his neck, and laid her cheek against his, he would respond readily enough, but it never occurred to him to take the initiative—he was so confident of Lucy; dear, demonstrative, impulsive Lucy.

When Lucy's little ways dropped from her, one by one, John felt at first surprised, then hurt, and finally alarmed. By slow and painful degrees he was forced to realise the fact that Lucy was growing cold towards him.

Most things endear themselves by virtue to their rarity, and kisses are no exception. To John, Lucy's kisses became desperately dear. At the end of a week, they had become priceless.

Other and less tangible proofs of Lucy's affection rose in value by precisely similar methods.

One day Lucy appeared at breakfast attired in a morning gown of pink muslin. Now, pink was a colour which John abominated. He could not have explained his aversion, but there it was, and Lucy knew it. She had a weakness for pink herself, because it suited her fair, fluffy hair, and dainty complexion, but to please John she had discarded the colour since her marriage—not without secret heart-burnings.

John stared at the pink muslin in displeased surprise.

"Whatever made you put on that thing, darling?" he demanded, a trifle irritably.

"What thing do you mean?" asked Lucy, in a tone of cool indifference.

John was not used to that tone from her. Somehow, it disconcerted him.

"Your frock," he murmured.

"What is the matter with my frock?"

"It's—it's pink, you know," he explained, almost meekly.

"Well?" said Lucy.

Her manner suggested polite inquiry.

This was too much for John.

"You know I hate pink!" he blurted out.

"Do you? I had forgotten. I'm sorry you don't like it, though, because I've decided upon pink for my new evening dress. It's my favourite colour, you know."

And Lucy calmly went on with her breakfast.

John was too taken aback to reply. He was so unaccustomed to this attitude on Lucy's part that he really didn't know how to meet it. Lucy, who had always shown the most touching regard for his slightest wish, what had come over her? It had never occurred to John, be it said, to describe this regard of Lucy's as "touching" until he had occasion to miss it. In fact, he had hardly been aware of its existence.

But the incident of the pink frock paved the way for a succession of small encounters of a similar nature between John and Lucy, in which the latter, by dint of a certain calm assumption of superiority, invariably had her own way.

And now John realised clearly what a gentle, affectionate, obedient little wife Lucy had been in the old days, before—before what?

What had happened? John asked himself miserably. Why was Lucy changed?

Try as he would, he could not evade the obvious answer—Lucy had ceased to love him.

At first, John fought against the suspicion with desperate indignation; but, as the days went by and Lucy grew colder and more and more distant in her manner, doubt became certainty, and John was forced to acknowledge to himself that his wife no longer cared for him.

And he had been so sure of her! So sure that, well—that the thought of losing her had never entered his mind and consequently——

With a sudden pang of self reproach, John realised the smug complacency with which he had always regarded Lucy's love for him.

"Fool! Presumptuous fool!" cried John.

"Meaning me, sir?"

John's confidential clerk looked up from his work with a somewhat scared expression.

John recovered himself with a start.

"No, Thompson, of course not. I—I was thinking of someone else. What's the time?"

"Ten to five, sir."

"Then I'll catch my early train. Good night, Thompson."

"Good-night, sir."

John had made up his mind. That night he would win or lose all. He would speak with Lucy, tell her everything that was in his mind—he would try to soften the heart she had hardened against him—he would appeal to her womanly pity and implore her to give him back the love he had lost.

He almost ran the half mile that divided his house from the station, and his hand trembled violently as he inserted his key in the latch and pushed open the door.

Everything within was quiet. Lucy did not run to meet him as she would have done once—it seemed so long ago now.

He ran upstairs, hastily changed his clothes, and hurried down to his wife's room. She was not there.

After what seemed an eternity, he heard the sound of the dinner gong. He wandered into the dining-room. Dinner was laid for two, as usual, with Clara, the maid, hovering in attendance. Lucy had not yet appeared.

"Where is your mistress?" asked John.

Clara looked surprised.

"She went out about an hour ago, sir, and said she might not be back for dinner."

"Is that all the message she left?"

"Yes, sir."

What did it mean? Lucy had never behaved like this before. To go out, leaving no other message than——

Not once since their marriage had she absented herself in this unaccountable way.

An hour passed—two hours—and still no Lucy came. John took up a book and tried to read. It was a new novel by his favourite author; John thought he had never read anything so dull. He threw down the book in despair, and glanced at his watch—five minutes past ten!

John walked to the window and lifted the blind. He could watch for Lucy from here, for the window commanded the only approach to the house.

He peered out into the dimly-lighted street, but could see nothing. Theirs was a lonely road that led nowhere in particular, and at night only an occasional belated inhabitant would pass their house.

John dropped the blind, and began pacing restlessly up and down the room.

Eleven o'clock came, but no Lucy.

John rang his bell, and Clara appeared in answer to the summons.

"You and cook can go to bed," he told the girl. "I am going to wait up for your mistress."

"Very well, sir, thank you. Good-night, sir."

"Good-night, Clara."

John listened as the maids tramped upstairs past his door to their room at the top of the house. When all was quiet he sank into a chair and buried his face in his hands.

Presently the clock in a neighbouring church tower began to strike. It was midnight.

John sat up in his chair and listened.

A cab was coming down the street. It stopped just under his window.

John ran down the stairs and flung open the door just as someone stepped out of the cab. It was Lucy.

She pulled out her purse, slowly and deliberately, and handed the cabman a coin. The man touched his hat and drove off.

Not till then did Lucy appear to notice John's presence.

She raised her eyebrows with an affectation of surprise.

"Oh, are you still up?" she remarked.

"Lucy, I have been mad with anxiety about you."

"That was scarcely necessary."

"Lucy, I don't understand; why did you leave that message? Where have you been?"

"My dear John, why all this excitement? And do you intend to stay out here all night?"

Without waiting for answer, she turned and walked into the house. He followed her in silence.

She flung off her wraps, and stood revealed in a dazzling garment of pink satin. He winced involuntarily as he saw the dress.

Lucy faced him tranquilly.

"I'm sorry you waited up for me," she said. "Really there was no need."

"No need! Lucy, where have you been?"

"I don't think it would interest you to know. Besides, I prefer not to tell you."

"Lucy!"

"Well?"

"What does this mean?"

Lucy stood tapping the carpet impatiently with one small foot.

"For Heaven's sake, don't adopt that tragic tone," she said. "It makes me tired."

Lucy had picked up the Americanism somewhere before her marriage, but had dropped it immediately afterwards at John's request. John hated Americanisms.

"Lucy, what does this mean?" said John, with a pale face.

For an instant Lucy hesitated. Then she laughed a hard little laugh.

"I don't choose to explain," she said, "and I wish you'd leave me alone. I'm tired."

John did not fly into a passion as she had expected. Without another word he turned away and left her. She heard him go upstairs to his own room and close the door. Then all was silent.

For several minutes Lucy remained motionless. Then she gathered up her satin gown, turned out the light, and stole noiselessly upstairs.

Softly she opened the door of her husband's room.

"John!" she whispered. "John!"

There was no answer. The room was in darkness.

She groped her way along the wall and switched on the light. John was sitting at his desk, his head resting upon his arms.

She came up behind him and touched him gently.

He started at the touch, and raised his head.

"John!" she whispered. "John! Do you really care so much?" And with a little sob she threw her arms about his neck and pressed her warm red lips against his white cheek.

"I do love you, John. I was only pretending—I thought you didn't care, and I wanted to punish you, and—and to find out whether you really did care—and—and I didn't think you did, and—and—oh, John, I've been so miserable!"

"Dear little girl, what put that idea into your head? There's not another man in the world who loves his wife as I love you."

"John! You never told me that before."

"Haven't I? Why, Lucy, Lucy, my darling, surely you knew—surely I've——"

"John, you've never said so. There are—there are heaps of things you've never said."

"And so you've been fretting. Poor little woman, I'm beginning to understand. What a thoughtless brute I've been. I—I've been taking things for granted, sweetheart. You've spoilt me. You've been too good to me. I've been an ungrateful scoundrel, Lucy, I see that now."

"But—but you loved me all the time?" asked Lucy, wistfully.

"My darling! Of course I did."

Lucy laid her soft cheek against his.

"You never told me. Women—like—to be told things," she said softly.

Alice bounded in unceremoniously. "Here I am at last," she announced.

Mrs. Lyndsey's Daughter.

Being the last of six stories told in the Brighton Express and now related

BY

WINIFRED GRAHAM.

"I suppose you are expecting my story to-night?" said Carter, as the six friends settled themselves comfortably in the carriage. "Well, I won't disappoint you; so here goes!"

"She was altogether charming. 'Mrs. Lyndsey? Oh, yes,' people would say when you mentioned her name; 'everyone knows her, and she is a very old friend of mine.'

"Each fresh acquaintance became a 'very old friend' in the course of a few weeks. They would quite forget the fact of their recent introduction to the fair widow.

"Though the bloom of youth had passed, there was still the attraction left of an elegant figure, handsome features, and burnished gold hair, bronzed by the sun of eight-and-thirty summers, which had glided lightly over Mrs. Lyndsey's head.

"She was one of those energetic and lively individuals who never rest. Wherever she went the widow entertained. She loved to gather her fellow-creatures round her, to be the centre of an admiring circle, to display her gifts as hostess. She knew exactly what everybody liked—who should meet who, and how to amuse them. It was always 'Liberty Hall' at Mrs. Lyndsey's. So many people invite their friends only to make them feel as if at school again, their pleasures being mapped out, while they are dictated to, and made to drive, ride, play golf, eat, drink, and smoke at stated hours. Dinner was the only immovable feast in the widow's establishment. You could breakfast, lunch, and tea when and where you pleased.

"Music was Mrs. Lyndsey's ruling passion. She took immense interest in it, from the fact that her family had all been great singers, while she could not produce a note in tune. She felt it her duty to compensate for this deficiency by becoming the patron of talented Nobodies, and bringing them to the front by her influence and power.

"Her latest discovery was a baritone, Bertrand Annesley, whose beautiful voice had first been heard at a large evening reception at her town house. It was given for his benefit, Mrs. Lyndsey having made up her mind to bring him to the fore. Society declared him a success, and since then he had become the fashion.

"He was a slim man with dark hair, deep-set blue eyes, clear-cut features, and straight, white teeth, which were displayed to advantage. I have heard them called aggressive teeth, since the singer always appeared to be showing them to you. He had a particularly fascinating manner, which alone should have made his way in the world of fashion. He was never humble, never proud, yet he always made you feel as if he were in want of some particular knowledge that you alone could supply.

"He was the only man I, for one, have ever met who could condole or congratulate without appearing at a disadvantage.

"'I adore "Buzz,"' Mrs. Lyndsey would say jokingly, since that was the nickname she had chosen to give Bertrand Annesley. 'It is so satisfactory to introduce a singer that everybody falls down to worship. I was his fairy godmother, you know. I call him my son.'

"This was a cloak with which she sought to conceal the open way in which she flirted with the young singer. It flattered her vanity that he should pose as her property.

"Directly the Goodwood week was over, Mrs. Lyndsey enlivened a country neighbourhood by descending upon it with a troop of London friends, and giving a series of garden parties.

"'I cannot think why the very word "garden" on an invitation card should instil the idea of boredom and insipidness to the average mind,' said Mrs. Lyndsey, looking up at Buzz. 'I pause before penning the word,' biting the tip of her quill doubtfully. 'It means those everlasting greenhouses, which the people will file through from a sense of duty, and pretend to admire the grapes.'

"'Yes; it is rather deadly.'

"'And the men won't come, Buzz. You cannot possibly talk to more than six girls at a time, while there are sure to be sixty.'

"It certainly sounded hopeless; Mr. Annesley looked perplexed.

"'But the local people will feel horribly defrauded if I don't give my dull afternoons.'

"'Why not try the effect of an evening garden party? These hot summer nights are made for it. Illuminate your grounds, and have singers on the lake. Voices sound enchanting across the water. You might get some really good professionals down for the occasion. Put them on a raft ablaze with red torches and coloured lights, and you will send all true lovers of music mad with joy.'

"'What beautiful ideas you have, Buzz! Think how romantic it will be!' cried Mrs. Lyndsey, her eyes sparkling with delight. 'Of course you will sing, though you had promised yourself a rest after the season. I could not attempt it without you as the "star." We must do the thing thoroughly well; but first of all I shall have to consult dear Mr. Bodkin; he is so dreadfully hurt if I get up anything without telling him.'

"'Who is Mr. Bodkin?' asked Buzz—the widow thought a trifle quickly.

"'Oh! don't you know? He is our fat old Squire; the best-hearted creature in the world. I make him my confidant in everything; he is so easily pleased and interested!'

"'Does Mrs. Bodkin share the confidence?'

"'How silly you are, Buzz! There is no Mrs. Bodkin. That's one of the dear Squire's most praiseworthy merits.'

"'He will be an acquisition, then, among the sixty girls, being a bachelor and well off.'

"'I am afraid I kindle the flame of jealousy in the heart of many a worthy village spinster. They tell me he is very solemn and morose when I desert the Hall—that he only waxes jocular once a year. As if I only saw him when I am here!'

"'Poor Mr. Bodkin, do not break his heart,' said Buzz compassionately.

"Mrs. Lyndsey rested her chin between her hands, put her elbows on the table, and, leaning forward, looked straight into Bernard Annesley's eyes.

"'Do you think I could?'

"'Why not?'

"'I am old.'

"He laughed.

"'Only the young can afford to say that,' he replied.

"'What night shall we have the party?' she said abruptly, changing the subject.

"'Friday week?'

"'No, an unlucky day.'

"'Surely you are not superstitious?'

"'Of course not, only dear Mr. Bodkin never fixes anything on Friday. He has some very strange practices and customs. Besides, if we put it off till Monday, Alice will be back. She'll enjoy it, you know. You have never seen my little girl, Buzz.'

"'It is a pleasure to come.'

"'She has been at a school in Germany—such a sweet child!'

"Mr. Annesley expected to see a girl of about twelve. To his surprise a beautiful young woman verging on eighteen arrived one evening, dusty and travel-strained, while they were at dinner.

"All Mrs. Lyndsey's guests were Londoners, and their costumes fairly dazzled Alice as she bounded in unceremoniously.

"'Here I am at last,' she announced, flinging back a long cloak and unwinding her veil. 'How do you do, everybody? How nice and clean you all look!'

"She crumpled her mother's chiffon in a fond embrace, and perched herself on the arm of a chair.

"'I've had an awful journey, darling,' she said, addressing Mrs. Lyndsey. 'Mariana, my maid, groaned all the time on the boat, though it was as calm as a lake. I believe she thought it was the right thing to do. I ran across some Americans I met in Paris fortunately, so they kept me company.'

"'In Paris, my dear! When were you there?' asked her mother wonderingly.

"'Don't you remember, Fraulein Wieder took me at

DYSPEPTICS.

Nervous, debilitated, half-dead people will gain new life, energy and strength from Mother Seigel's Syrup, because it does the only thing which can give permanent relief—helps you to digest your food. Food is a strength-maker and health-maker, but it must be digested. Discomfort after meals, pains in the chest and shoulders, headaches, palpitation, flatulence, loss of appetite, broken sleep, constant weariness of mind and body, these are sure signs of indigestion.

SEIGEL'S SYRUP

The unfailing success of Mother Seigel's Syrup in curing all these weakening and distressing symptoms of imperfect digestion lies in the power of the root and herb extracts, of which it is composed, to regulate and tone the stomach, liver and kidneys. When they are clogged with the decayed products of indigestion, it clears them of their noxious load. When weak, it gives them tone and vitality, makes them equal to their work. Then food eaten with a relish and digested as a perfect mill grinds grain, makes and keeps your body strong and healthy.

WILL CURE YOU.

"For several years chronic dyspepsia was the curse of my life," says Mr. R. Locke, of 2 King Street, Hammersmith. "After eating I had a feeling of fulness in the chest, a gnawing pain and weight at the stomach and an incessant aching in the shoulder blades. I had little or no appetite and was literally afraid to eat.

SEIGEL'S SYRUP

I felt tired and lifeless, and at times my head was in a whirl with giddiness. Biliousness and constipation no doubt were the cause of this. Doctors could not cure me, and I was well nigh in despair, when a friend advised me to try Mother Seigel's Syrup. After taking two bottles my appetite improved, and I could digest what I ate. Eight bottles completed the cure, and though seven years have gone by since then I have never again had an attack of indigestion."

CURES CONSTIPATION.

Easter for a week? You paid for it, anyway—the bill was enormous. Fraulein got all her summer things out of it.'

"'Oh, Alice!' exclaimed Mrs. Lyndsey with mild reproach.

"'Thank goodness, I am not going back. You will have to let me out now, Mammy, and I shall date you terribly.'

"Mrs. Lyndsey frowned slightly under her auburn fringe, though she smiled to her guests, with a pretty little shrug of her bare shoulders, as much as to say, 'I don't care.'

"'I shall want to be properly introduced when I am clothed decently and in my right mind,' said Alice, slipping off the chair, and throwing her cloak over her arm. 'I am dead beat and ravenous now, but will dine upstairs and tumble into bed, so good-night all. To-morrow you shall make my acquaintance.'

"So saying she walked to the door with an easy, gliding step.

"After dinner Mrs. Lyndsey went up and found Alice lounging in a white dressing-gown after a bath, with the remains of a hot chicken by her side.

"'They sent me up champagne, darling,' she said, 'but you know I drink beer.'

"'Beer!' cried Mrs. Lyndsey. 'A girl like you taking beer? It does not sound at all nice, and so very bad for the complexion!'

"'That comes of stagnating in Germany,' replied Alice with a smile. 'But I will try and tone down and do you credit. By the way, while we were waiting in London (three hours, you know) I could not sit in a hotel doing nothing, so I went to Madame Lottingdale and ordered some smart frocks. You are not angry, are you? I bought an exquisite pale pink dress for your evening garden-party. I look lovely in it.'

"Mrs. Lyndsey's face fell.

"'I say, you don't mind me looking lovely, Mammy, do you?'

"'What an absurd idea, Alice; only I was going to wear pale pink, and we shall be laughed at if we dress alike.'

"'All right. I will wear the blue. I bought it at the same time and it is just as pretty, so don't fret.'

"Mrs. Lyndsey returned to the drawing-room with a sigh. She thoroughly realised at last that she was actually the possessor of a grown-up daughter.

"'If only she could have stayed at school another year,' she thought mournfully. 'Fancy me a chaperon!'

"Alice made herself popular at once with her mother's guests—she was so merry and high-spirited. She inherited Mrs. Lyndsey's gift of becoming most intimate immediately with comparative strangers, and making them feel as if they had known her all their life.

"She treated Bertrand Annesley as a sort of elder brother, and very soon adopted the familiar term of 'Buzz,' hitherto reserved for Mrs. Lyndsey only.

"Fate favoured the evening garden-party, a glorious moon beaming on the revellers, and as Alice listened, enthralled, to Bertrand's voice swelling across the water, she thought she had never heard anything so beautiful in all her life.

"When he sprang to the shore from the boat Alice's eyes glowed. She laid her cool fingers in his palm, and spoke from her heart:

"'That was grand,' she said, 'grand!' And her praise was so genuine that it pleased him well.

"'I wonder what you have in your throat to give you that voice?' she continued, after a pause. 'It comes out like the breath of your soul. I expect you will sing when you die, or if you groan it will be musical.'

"Mrs. Lyndsey moved between them.

"'Buzz, Lady Gallone wants to know you. Alice, my dear, do go and talk to that dreadful Mr. Sowerbutt, or I am sure he will tack on to someone and worry them to death. He is all right if you know his pedigree, who he is, and all about him, but I do hate a man who makes you feel hot when you introduce him.'

"'Sing again, Buzz,' said Alice, as she went away.

"'Buzz!' laughed Mrs. Lyndsey, looking after her daughter's retreating figure. 'You must excuse her, but she's only a schoolgirl still—a mere child.'

"The evening proved an immense success; even Mr. Bodkin said so, and he had prophesied a failure from the first.

"He raised Mrs. Lyndsey's hand to his lips under the shadow of the trees.

"'It is all so like you,' he said, 'utterly beautiful, original, fascinating.'

"She laughed and turned away.

"'Why had he stopped at her hand?' Mr. Bodkin asked himself afterwards.

"'He who hesitates is lost!' and then there was that singing chap, whom idle gossips termed, 'her latest.'

"The word struck terror to his heart.

"Whenever he tried to find her for a moment alone, some aggravating individual always intervened.

"The summer days of outdoor pleasures passed swiftly by, and Mrs. Lyndsey gradually began to ask herself why they were the happiest she had ever spent.

"Involuntarily her eyes turned to Bertrand Annesley as if in answer to the thought.

"How handsome he looked, seated at the piano, his hands straying idly over the keys, his voice singing snatches of song.

"Mrs. Lyndsey was reading in a low window-seat, but the words, and the sense, became jumbled in her mind. She was sure the heroine had just said something brilliant, for she scanned a page that struck her as clever, though a moment later she had forgotten it.

"Finally the book fell idly in her lap. She was tired of epigrams. They were alone in the cool solitude of her boudoir. She picked a rose growing in the window and began plucking off the leaves and rolling them between her finger and thumb.

"Then, glancing out, she saw her friends in the garden, and drew back behind the curtain; it was pleasanter here with Buzz.

"'This is the privilege of great friendship,' he said, speaking as he played. 'To be together in silence and not feel bound to talk.'

"Mrs. Lyndsey ceased rolling the soft velvet leaves, and looked across at Bertrand Annesley. She leant her head against the panel and smiled languidly.

"'Of great friendship,' she repeated, as if the words were sweet.

"'I hope,' murmured the man, and he touched the keys so softly that his music sounded faint and far away, 'that it may be always so, through all the years that are beyond. I seem to picture them stretching out before us, bright and beautiful, unchanging save for the uniting of a closer bond.'

"Mrs. Lyndsey's heart began to flutter; she caught her breath. A faint pink stole into her cheeks. The melody seemed surging in her ears; it breathed of love, of life—life as she had never known it. She remembered her wedding day with the rich man who had been so kind always and considerate.

"'He was very nice,' Mrs. Lyndsey would say, if questioned about her first husband.

"Now she began to feel the want of a companion—a man who would be her right hand in everything. Buzz was always ready to suggest and advise, she could rely on him to do her every wish, to help, to entertain, to banish ennui, to soothe a fretful mood.

"'I don't know how I shall tear myself away,' he said, as if reading her thoughts.

"'But you will not leave us yet? I should be quite lost here in the country without you.'

"'How good of you to say that. I only wish I could believe it.'

"'Buzz, do you doubt my word? Should I favour you with Society lies?'

"'Why not? They are very graceful things, made for pretty lips.'

"Mrs. Lyndsey tapped her foot on the soft carpet a trifle impatiently.

"'It is thanks to you,' said Bertrand, 'that I am what I am. You "made" me, Mrs. Lyndsey—there is no other word. I am now, through your kind help, a rich man.

A HINT TO STOUT LADIES.

LADIES are constantly complaining that they cannot retain their youthfulness of figure without either taking vigorous exercise in the gymnasium, wearing strongly boned and tightly-laced corsets, or going in for a course of semi-starvation, to all of which they feel there are the strongest objections And it is well that these objections are heeded, for all such drastic and exhausting methods of overcoming obesity, or of checking its approach, are weakening and debilitating in the extreme, and if persevered in, may leave lasting evil effects upon the system. Very different indeed is the simple and healthful method of permanently reducing a too rotund figure to beautiful proportions known as the "Russell" treatment. By means of this wonderful system the first day's reduction amounts to from ½ lb. to 2lb., and this decrease continues daily in the same ratio until normal size and weight are attained. The fullest particulars of the system are set forth by the originator, Mr. F. Cecil Russell, in his admirable book entitled "Corpulency and the Cure," which he will be pleased to send to any applicant who sends him her address and three penny stamps. For the benefit of our stout friends we append Mr. Russell's address: Woburn House, Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C.—Reprinted from the Penny Illustrated Paper.

You see our ideas of wealth are slightly different, yet I consider myself at least sufficiently well off to think of marriage. Lately, I have been deeply, seriously, considering the subject—for love, Mrs. Lyndsey, cannot be lightly put aside.'

"His eyes grew bright with passion; he ceased playing.

"'You said,' he continued, changing his tone to one of intreaty, 'that you and your daughter would come and stay with me when your visitors leave. I should be so proud to return, in ever so slight a measure, your hospitality. By conferring this favour on me you will——'

"But Mrs. Lyndsey interrupted him.

"'I did not know that you had taken it seriously, Buzz. I only spoke in jest. You know I should enjoy to come above all things, and for a moment I was tempted. But——'

"'But what?'

"'Well, come here, and I will tell you.'

"He crossed the room and seated himself beside her.

"'You see, Buzz dear, people talk so dreadfully; the world is not kind to lonely women. If you were a relation it would be different; but, after all, we are nothing to each other.'

"'Would you let me be something, then?' he asked, his face paling with sudden anxiety—'a relation, for instance? I have longed to tell you the secret of my heart, but at last I believe you guess it—you know and understand. Till now I have not had the courage to speak to you. I never realised before I came here what it was to love, and then I was appalled at the thought of my own unworthiness—till I saw that my passion was returned—I——'

"He seized her hand, and as he did so the door opened, and Alice, radiant, breathless, entered the room.

"She had a tennis racket in her hand, which she flung on the sofa.

"'I have won the tournament—congratulate me, Buzz!'

"'Well done! How clever you are!' Mrs. Lyndsey's cheeks were aflame, her eyes gleamed in an odd, excited way, while her fingers nervously tore the roses, and let their crushed leaves fall scattered on the window-seat. Her heart swelled with pride and joy as she gazed tenderly at Buzz. The sweet truth had been revealed at last—he loved her! he loved her! Oh, why had Alice come so inopportunely, as the words trembled on his lips. She was always obtruding her personality when least wanted, contrasting her young freshness with matured bloom.

"'What are you two doing?' asked Alice, with a look at Bertrand that Mrs. Lyndsey could not understand. Was it possible that the girl was in the habit of vulgarly chaffing him about his devotion to her mother?

"'Oh!' as if suddenly remembering something, 'I met Mr. Bodkin—he was trying a new horse, such a beauty! I thought it would kick his dog-cart to pieces. He gave me this letter for you, mamma—said it was very important, and you were to read it at once—alone!"

"Mr. Annesley took the hint, for Alice gave him a look that plainly said: 'Go!'

"As she left the room, Alice went over to the piano, and began to strum.

"'Pray have some consideration for my nerves,' sighed Mrs. Lyndsey, tearing open the envelope. Her mind was so full of Buzz that she could hardly grasp the sense of Mr. Bodkin's elaborate epistle. She read it with a strange expression in her eyes.

"'Poor man!' she thought, a pitying little smile flickering over her proud lips. 'Fancy him competing against Buzz! Alice, my child, come here. I want a serious talk with you.'

"The girl sprang to her feet with an inquiring look.

"'Yes, mamma, what is it?'

"She came to her mother's feet, and drew a low stool forward, resting her arms on Mrs. Lyndsey's knees. There was a glance of suspicion in her eyes as to the nature of this conversation. The widow hesitated, her cheeks as crimson now as the fallen rose she had destroyed. Then she bent down her head and raised Alice's face with one of her heavily-ringed fingers under the girl's chin.

"'I am going to ask you a straight question,' she said abruptly; 'answer me truly.'

"A moment's pause.

"'Alice, would you like to have a step-father?"

"The girl laughed, as if the words brought no surprise to her wide-awake soul.

"'How well she is taking it!' thought Mrs. Lyndsey, hardly able to conceal her delight, as she thought of the young and talented lover she had brought to her feet.

"'Darling!' cried Alice with good-humoured approval, 'it's just the thing of all others I should most desire. I want to see you happy, as I am. It is quite horrid of me not to have confided in you before; but I've often heard you declare that early marriages are a mistake, and of course I know it would be very dreadful to be a grandmother, so I was afraid you would say no. But now that the overwhelming influence of love has come into your life also, I feel it is time to speak. Here is another straight question: Mamma, would you like a son-in-law?'

"Mrs. Lyndsey's astonished eyes expanded. She still looked on Alice as a mere child. This was a revelation.

"Her mother was speechless from sheer surprise.

"'You see,' the girl continued, 'of course he knows I am rather young and inexperienced, and fears that you will blame him for stealing me so soon. It is rather greedy, isn't it?' with a short little laugh, and a quickening of her pulses. 'He has meant to ask your consent every day, but something always happened to prevent him. I really wonder we ever got engaged at all, with so many visitors in the house.

"'Naturally I can guess who you are going to marry, and I am sure Mr. Bodkin will make you an excellent husband. I believe an old man's darling has the best of it in the end. Of course, I don't mean because he dies sooner. Oh, mamma, in your new-found happiness, surely you will never refuse me Buzz? He said he would tell you about it, but I don't believe he has.'

"Alice looked down with a shy smile, her cheeks were burning, and she did not notice the horror and anguish that dimmed her mother's eyes.

"Mrs. Lyndsey pressed one hand to her throat, and dug the pink nails of the other into her small palm.

"The struggle lasted a moment, then she regained her composure.

"'Tell him he may have me,' pleaded Alice.

"Mrs. Lyndsey's voice was strained and faint.

"'I am too fond of Buzz,' she replied slowly, 'to deny him anything.'

"'You dear!' gasped Alice with a sigh of relief. 'But, oh, how selfish I am to worry you at such a time with my own affairs! May I see Mr. Bodkin's letter? Or are proposals always strictly private? I would rather like it in black and white. Do let me have one peep; he is to be my father, so it can't matter.'

"Mrs. Lyndsey, now calm and collected, rose and went to her desk.

"'If you will write now, mamma, Buzz and I will walk to the Manor House and leave your letter at the lodge.'

"Mrs. Lyndsey sealed the envelope and handed it to her daughter. She drew a long breath that sounded rather like a sob.

"'Take it,' she said. 'There will be one heart happier for this afternoon's work.'

"Then she went back to the window-seat, and watched them down the drive."

What Deaf People Should Avoid.

The things that deaf people should avoid are well summed up in a few brief hints entitled "Don'ts for the Deaf," part of an article on "Hygiene of the Ear," contained in the latest number of the "Review of the Ear, Nose, and Throat Diseases." Turning the leaves of this popular magazine one also finds much of interest in the way of general information on deafness and different forms of catarrh. The routine treatment of the aural specialist comes in for much criticism, and new methods are thoroughly discussed, preference being given to the new treatment based on outward applications behind the ears. This treatment, the Drouet Method, which can be applied at home, is said to have effected a large number of cures in cases where other methods failed. Those who are interested in the subject can obtain a copy of the "Review of Ear, Nose, and Throat Diseases," free by post, by addressing the Editor, Drouet Institute, 10, Marble Arch, London, W. Another Special feature of the "Review" is the enclosure of a Patient's Report Form, for the benefit of those who wish advice, for which no fee is charged if given by correspondence.

The Editor advises patients, however, whenever possible, to visit the Drouet Institute for a personal consultation with the medical staff. Consulting hours are, in the morning, 10 to 12, and in the afternoon, 2 to 4, week days only. A fee of five shillings is charged for personal consultations.

To CURE Drunkards

MRS. GEO. FULLER, who saved her husband.

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the Giving Your Address.

"G. H." has grown very intimate with a gentleman who lives some distance away from her home. He does not know her address. Should "G. H." give it to him, or would that be a forward thing to do?

* * * * *

If you have grown very intimate friends it is only natural that he should know where you live. If you are going to be sweethearts, some day or another he will have to meet your parents or friends, so it would be as well to let him know your address now as then.

Girl versus Relations.

"TROUBLED." You have left your usual place of worship and joined that of your sweetheart, and, as a result, have offended your old friends, and relations. When you took your young lady to see your parents they were very cool, as they did not favour your change of views. Would I advise you to keep her away from your parents for awhile?

* * * * *

If you changed your views sincerely, and not merely to join the same congregation as your sweetheart, then you should have the courage of your convictions. Let your parents and old friends see that you are sincere and in earnest over the matter, and they will respect you ultimately. Meanwhile, perhaps you had better not bring your young lady into too close touch with them. Wait until your parents and friends have appreciated the sincerity of your action, and then re-introduce the girl to them.

A Self-made Man's Worries.

"R" began as a porter in a very large business. Now he is manager, and engaged to a girl very much above him in social position, whose family is very well connected. "R." is nervous as to how to conduct himself in society, as he was only poorly educated, and never mixed very much amongst people. How can he acquire the necessary manners?

* * * * *

If "R." has worked his way up to be manager of his business it is clear that he must have one very great quality—common sense. If that stood him in good stead in business, and brought him to the top of the tree, so will it in society. Let him just be natural, and not assume any airs and graces which are not inborn, and people will take him at his right merit. If he pretended to be what he is not, people would surely see through the mask and his position would be less agreeable.

* * * * *

After all, let people talk as they like, there is always an admiration for people who are successful. At the same time, it would not do "R." any harm to make himself acquainted with the ordinary rules of etiquette, by reading one of the books on that subject. There are little things which one does not gather instinctively, but must learn from experience or study. In "R.'s" case, study would be better.

A Three Years' Friendship.

"I HAVE been going to places of amusement with a young man for three years," writes "MARY." "The more I see of him the better I like him—I am afraid more than as a mere friend. Do you advise me not to see him again?"

* * * * *

No, I don't advise you to give him up. After all, three years is a good long time to have been meeting a young man, and if you have now discovered that you value him above friendship, let us hope that something serious will result. You have tried each other, and found each other suited to companionship. What better case for an engagement if he should be feeling the same as yourself?

A Mysterious Coolness.

"For three years I have been very intimate with a girl," writes "BROKEN-HEARTED." "The other day she suddenly became very cold in her manner. We had no quarrel. She now only recognises me when she meets me. I am sorely troubled, and have sent two friends of hers to ask an explanation. She says it is all my fault, and that she loves me as much as ever."

* * * * *

You should ask her yourself for an explanation, not trust the task to others. Evidently she has heard or suspected something about you of which you do not know. You should find out exactly what it is that troubles her, and give her every explanation in your power. It is of no use allowing matters to remain as at present.

Unreasonable Parents.

"EDITH" is engaged, and her parents have agreed to her marrying within the next year. Yet they consistently refuse to allow her fiancé to meet her alone in the house. They insist on all meetings taking place out, and will not allow the young couple to be together in a sitting-room. Do I not think this very hard on them?

* * * * *

If your parents have spare rooms it seems hard that they cannot leave you two alone together. After all, you are engaged, and they have consented to your marriage. They ought, therefore, to trust both you and your fiancé. One would think they would prefer your meeting at home rather than elsewhere. But parents are still very eccentric about their children's love affairs. It seems one of those things which they are fated to misunderstand. You have my sympathy.

A Defence of Colonial Men.

"A COLONIAL." Thank you for your letter. I would not for worlds have intended to suggest that there are not, as you say, thousands of men in South Africa as worthy of a British girl's hand as are to be found at home. It may be, too, as you say, that "you would find more gentlemen in the true sense of the word in the colonies than at home, as a result of free life, pure air, and everything that goes to make a man a man."

* * * * *

The opinion I quoted in December, to which you refer, was the verdict of several girl correspondents, and I am glad to hear of the other side of the case, which I would much rather believe to be the correct one. However, when I am asked whether a girl should go to South Africa, with a view to finding a husband, I still reply that if a girl has not met the right man among the many that she should meet at home, I think she would have the same difficulty abroad.

* * * * *

Further, I suppose you will not differ from me in saying that, in the great mining centres, there is a very large number of men who do not belong to the class of "true gentlemen" to which you refer. As you must know, such places often contain the outcasts of every civilised nation.
